BRITISH BRINSMEAD

It is because of its intrinsic qualities that the Brinsmead Piano has attained the unsurpassed reputation in which it is held in all countries. It is the piano that all the world knows, uses, and admires, not because it is British, but because it is best.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, LTD., 18-22, WIGMORE STREET, W.

J. & P. SCHIEDMAYER PIANOS AT THE TURIN EXHIBITION, 1911.

Extract from a leading Continental paper:

"The most important Exhibition amongst German piano manufacturers is that of the world-renowned firm, J. & P. SCHIEDMAYER, OF STUTTGART. This firm has supplied 16 Imperial and Royal Courts, and is in possession of 54 medals and diplomas of honour and four Grands Prix at the International Exhibitions of Paris, 1900, St. Louis, 1904, Roubaix, 1911, and Turin, 1911, and has become as popular in Italy as in other countries. The Concert Room at Turin contains eleven instruments of magnificent construction. All the instruments are distinguished by a full and delightful tone."

Mr. SCHIEDMAYER, head of the firm of J. & P. Schiedmayer, has been officially appointed Judge at 13 Exhibitions (including Brussels, 1910), at all of which his pianos were, of course, "hors concours." This honour acknowledges him to be one of the greatest authorities on piano construction in the world.

The Trade and Profession are invited to call at Archibald Ramsden's, and test for themselves as to the magnificent tone quality and construction of these instruments.

Auction Rooms specially for the Sale of Musical Property.

MESSRS. PUTTICK & SIMPSON, Auctioneers, 47, Leicester Square, London, W.C., hold SPECIAL SALES of MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS on or about the 20th of every month. Sales of Musical Libraries, Music Plates, and Copyrights, Trade Stocks, Manufacturers' Plant, &c., are held as occasion may require. Valuations for Probate or Legacy Duty, or for Public or Private Sale Terms on application.

EVERY MUSICIAN KNOWS that there should be no more necessity to read each note separately than to spell out each letter of a word; but that is undoubtedly the process adopted by the majority of pianoforte students. Hence the poor progress made in Sight-playing by nearly every student, and the inability of those who can play quite difficult music after practice to play much simpler music at first sight. To become a good Sight-player

SPECIAL AID IS NECESSARY.

That aid is provided by the

EHREMAYER SYSTEM OF PIANOFORTE SIGHT-PLAYING

—the first and only System which teaches Sight-playing by a direct method, and which enables any pianist to play at sight all his new music after three months' tuition, entailing about 15 minutes' daily practising.

The Fee for the complete Course of Correspondence Lessons is £3 3s. 0d.

Every Pianist and Student should write for the Booklet describing the methods adopted, sent post-free on application to

L. M. EHREMAYER,
27, CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

NO PIANIST

can afford nowadays to be without the help of the well-known MACDONALD SMITH System of Piano-Playing.

You have heard of the wonderful results his pupils obtain, but have you tried the Course of Postal Lessons?

The System cannot be explained in an advertisement, but fullest particulars are given in the Illustrated Book "Light on Pianoforte Playing," sent free by post.

COMPLETE COURSE OF LESSONS BY CORRESPONDENCE,
THREE GUINEAS (by Instalments if desired).
Course "B" for Beginners, Course "C" for Players.

Stockport Vocal Society, December 4, 1911.—"Mr. Tree had ample opportunity of showing his artistic gifts. Whether he is singing nonsense verse, a spirited martial air, a charming French love ballad, or a vivid realistic piece, he always makes the music 'live.' He is undoubtedly one of the cleverest vocalists in this country. He gave no less than ten songs, and every one was a delightful piece of vocalisation. Like the audience in their demand for encores we find it difficult to curb our enthusiasm in writing about such a capable singer."—Advertiser.

TOILERS OF THE DEEP

CANTATA

FOR FEMALE VOICES

VERSE BY JAMES STRANG

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The musical settings are twelve in number, the part-writing for first and second sopranos and contraltos. The utmost care and finish has been bestowed in wedding appropriate music to the verse, and Mr. Gaul has written nothing finer, nor more melodious and captivating in this branch of composition specially adapted for High Schools for Girls. The cantata begins with an instrumental introduction in the form of a barcarolle, in G minor, 9-8 time, moderato. At the close the tempo changes to 2-4, Allegro agitato, descriptive of an approaching storm. But this is of short duration and leads to the chorus, 'Toiling and toss'd on the restless sea,' which is dramatic and spirited in character, the theme being based upon a bright melody, and the part-writing remarkably effective. No. 2 is a Cradle Song, 'Come, my baby,' in G major, Andante moderato, 3-4 time, allotted to a contralto. The accompaniment to this delightful lullaby is constructed on a pedal note, the melody that accompanies it being at once expressive and thoroughly characteristic. The chorus which immediately follows the cradle song opens with a tempestuous instrumental introduction of chromatic scale-passages and chords, the key now changing into C major, 12-8 time, Allegro con fuoco. At the fourteenth bar the chorus enters with 'Oh, ho! for the winds that blow'; the whole of this number being of an impassionate and restless character. Quite in contrast to the foregoing is the pretty ballad for soprano, 'A mermaid dwelt,' which closely follows the chorus. It is in Tembo di Barcarolle in F major, 6-8 time, quaint and most espressivo. A short unaccompanied trio, 'The twilight gray is falling,' brings us to what may be termed the gem of the work, a song for soprano, 'O, manly hearts.' The key is E flat major, 2-4 time, Andantino espressivo. Mr. Gaul is here in his happiest mood, the whole song being graceful and charming to a degree. The number that follows is the chorus 'Darker and darker grows the night,' which is preceded by a characteristic instrumental prelude in triplet passages, 2-2 time, C minor, Allegro con fuoco. The whole of this chorus will deeply impress the attentive listener. No. 8, 'A prayer for those at sea,' for chorus, with an organ accompaniment, is in the key of F, 3-4 time, alla cappella, and is another example of purely melodious part-writing which characterises Mr. Gaul's compositions, and which is certainly conceived in his best and most expressive manner. The concluding numbers are a short Intermezzo, entitled 'Break of day,' a duet for soprano and contralto, 'Through golden mists of morn,' in the key of B flat, 12-8 time, Allegretto con moto, an exceedingly animated movement; then comes another cradle song, expressive of the father's safe return from sea, and, finally, the concluding joyous chorus, 'Now let songs of gladness rise.' Taking the cantata as a whole, it is a delightful work, replete with artistic workmanship and, above all, melodious and expressive."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

THE ELFIN HILL

AN OPERETTA FOR SCHOOL USE

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"'The Elfin Hill' is founded on one of Hans Andersen's charming stories, and the libretto has been written in dainty and graceful language by Miss Baldwick. The operetta opens with a short overture describing moonlight on the Dovrefeld Mountains, and Mr. Gaul has been particularly happy in infusing the Norse spirit into that portion of his music which deals with goblin life in Norway. When the goblins become visitors in fairyland, the character of the music changes; lightness is its predominant feature, perhaps the choicest fragment being a fairy dance. This latter, together with a very characteristic dance of elves and a shadow dance, were beautifully executed."—Birmingham Gazette.

"By the production of these Trios our townsman, Mr. A. R. Gaul, has made a valuable addition to the many beautiful and useful compositions he has formerly given to the public. Mr. Gaul's music is unfailingly charming, the voice-parts being so disposed that they may be easily learnt, and the accompaniments are as characteristic as they are pretty. Each separate piece is so good that we cannot make references to special favourites. Young ladies who take pleasure in part-singing will find variety in the collection, and both in the home-circle and in the school class Mr. Gaul's new work is sure to be heartily welcomed."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

PASSION SERVICE

(Only published in Vocal Score)

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnatian before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' Mr. Gaul's work will undoubtedly greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed. The work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul has to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

RECENT BACH LITERATURE.

By Ernest Newman.

I.

If a being from another planet could visit us to-day, and read some of the Bach literature of the last ten years or so, he would probably come to the conclusion that this Bach of whom so much was being spoken and written could have only recently died, for how otherwise could he explain the keenness with which everyone was studying him, and the ever new things that this student and that was daily discovering in his music? His stupefaction on learning that Bach lived some two hundred years ago would probably be pitiful to see. How is it, he would ask, that all these characteristic qualities of his were not discovered long ago and his true place given him among the musicians of the past and present? We of this planet are sometimes inclined to ask the same question. Even in the half-century or so that Bach has been the unquestioned head and fount of almost all the music we can imagine, research has revealed a dozen new aspects of him, and slowly changed our general view not only of him but of æsthetics in general. A historical account of the various critical estimates of Bach from generation to generation would be very interesting. In his own day, and for some time afterwards, as everyone knows, he was primarily reverenced as a great organist, and only secondarily considered as a composer. The reference to him in the index to Hawkins's History (1776) summarises this attitude most amusingly: 'Bach, Johann Sebastian, a most famous organist, v. 254. Is sent for by the King of Poland to answer a challenge of Marchand, the French organist; accepts it, and obtains a complete victory, 255. A composition of his, 256 et seq.' All Hawkins has to say of him as a composer is that 'Amongst a great variety of excellent compositions for the harpsichord he published, in 1726, a collection of lessons entitled Clavierübung, or Practice for the Harpsichord. He composed a double fugue in three subjects, in one of which he introduced his name.' Burney knows hardly any more. Bach is still merely the great organist. His harpsichord music has been put in the shade by 'the more elegant and expressive compositions of C. P. Emmanuel Bach.' He has heard—which apparently Hawkins had not—that Bach wrote music for the Church; but he follows a German critic in ranking him, in this department, second to Fux. He quotes Marpurg's encomium of Bach as an organist and a writer of fugues—that he is 'many great musicians in one; profound in science, fertile in fancy, and in taste easy and natural'—only to disagree with the latter part of it. 'This truly great man,' he remarks gravely, 'seems by his works for the organ, of which I am in possession of the chief part, to have been constantly in search of what was new and difficult, without the least attention to nature and facility.' In his 'Present state of music in Germany,' Burney carefully explains that the admired harpsichord style of composition of Emmanuel Bach, his 'taste and refinement, could neither have been inherited nor adopted' from his father; 'for that venerable musician, though unequalled in learning and contrivance, thought it so necessary to crowd into both hands all the harmony he could grasp that he must inevitably have sacrificed melody and expression.'

Apart from one or two of his pupils, who no doubt had some intuition of the superlative greatness of their master, no one in the latter half of the 18th century seems to have been able to estimate him all round at his true value. Johann Christian Bach—the 'London Bach'—spoke of his father as 'the old perruque.' Emmanuel and Friedemann had more filial piety, but still saw little in his music of the glory that we see there. In a list of the great German composers of the day that is given in the same number of Mizler's Bibliothek that contained the celebrated obituary notice of Bach, his name comes seventh—after Hasse, Handel, Telemann, the two Grauns, and Stölzel, and only one ahead of Pisendel, Quanz, and Bümler. The growing Handel worship of that epoch, the new developments in music generally, and the changed spirit in religion, all helped to retard the due recognition of Bach's genius. As Dr. Schweitzer says, 'at the end of the 18th century it seemed, on the whole, as if Bach were for ever dead.' Then came the revival, headed by Forkel, Rochlitz and Zelter, and carried on by Mendelssohn and others. But here we have to note again the curious fact to which I have already called attention—that with all their admiration for Bach, not one of these pioneers, with the exception of Mosevius, quite saw him as we see him now, as not only a great musician but a great poet and painter in music. To some extent, of course, this is explained by the fact that a number of his works were unknown to them, and that probably not one of them knew well as a whole even such works as were accessible. What may be called in broad terms the purely musical point of view of Bach—the recognition of him as a consummate craftsman, and a man of profound musical moods, but with little sense of the definitely poetical quality of his imagination and his constant search for drastic poetic and pictorial expression—is exemplified in the 'Bach letters' of Samuel Wesley, who fought Bach's battle with magnificent courage in the early years of the 19th century. It does one good to see this glorious old fellow with his coat perpetually off, hitting out lustily at every nose that seemed to have in it a sneer or a challenge for his idol—especially if it happened to be a Handelian nose. The English language will hardly supply him with epithets adequate to express his adoration of Bach—'our demi-god,' 'the greatest master of harmony in any age or country,'

'our grand hero,' 'the greatest master in the world,' 'our matchless man, if man he may be called,' 'our idol,' 'the very quintessence of all musical excellence,' the author of 'a musical Bible unrivalled or unlimited,' one 'certainly dropped down among us from heaven,' and finally 'The MAN.' Yet withal Wesley, knowing mostly only the clavier and organ works, and certainly not perceiving the poetic symbolism of many of the latter, could hardly have had more than the merest glimpse into those recesses of Bach's soul that constitute for us of to-day the essential Bach. Even Zelter, whose correspondence with Goethe is full of not merely enthusiastic but wise judgments of the composer, though he saw that 'in the vocal works there is often much more than the words imply,'—for example, 'a passus and sepultus introduces the last pulsations of the silent powers, a resurrexit or a Gloria Dei Patris the eternal regions of sanctified suffering, in contrast with the hollowness of earthly things,'—remarks that 'as yet one can scarcely venture to style him a poet of the highest order, although he belongs to those who, like your Shakespeare, are far above childish playthings.'* One could not, however, more pointedly illustrate the difference between the older and the modern appreciation of Bach than by imagining a book such as Alfred Heuss's 'Johann Sebastian Bach's Matthäus-Passion,' † or the analysis of the Passion by Schweitzer, to be communicable to Mendelssohn. His performance of the 'Matthew' Passion in Berlin, in 1829, did much to set Bach on his feet again after so many generations of neglect. No one, surely, could have worked harder at the Passion than he. Yet how much of Bach's purpose—particularly his pictorial purpose—must have remained unrevealed to him!

II.

In the latter half of the 19th century it must have seemed as if at last Bach had come into his own. The great Bachgesellschaft edition gave to the world all that was, and perhaps is, to be discovered of his music. Between 1873 and 1880 appeared Spitta's monumental biography, that up to almost yesterday was regarded as nearly the last word on the subject of Bach; even in the new edition of 'Grove' it is spoken of as 'an accurate and perfectly exhaustive treatise of all relating to the subject,' while a somewhat similar eulogium is passed upon it in the newest Encyclopædia Britannica. No lover of Bach can ever speak or think of Spitta's work without the deepest admiration and respect; yet, careful and copious as it is, and firmly as its foundations stand, it can no longer be regarded as the complete and unerring guide it was formerly thought to be. Schweitzer and others have corrected its occasional historical errors, and expanded from other sources Spitta's information as to the musical life of Bach's time,—for research has been particularly busy in this latter department during the past decade. But beyond this, the infallibility of Spitta's judgment and his very competence as a musician have been sharply called in question by one or two writers, notably by Johannes Schreyer in his 'Beiträge zur Bach-Kritik.'‡ Schreyer's main contention is that Spitta has sometimes been superficial in his examination of the music and uncritical in his application of tests to it, with the result that undoubtedly unauthentic works have been accepted as genuine compositions of Bach. Here we are obviously at the beginning of a line of research that may have important results. Schreyer holds that Spitta placed too much reliance on the old Necrology and on Forkel, and moreover that 'his musical endowments and training were not on a par with his historical.' After showing the importance universally attached to purity of style in the 18th century, Schreyer argues that the works in which we find parallel octaves and fifths in profusion have been falsely ascribed to Bach, or could at best be only juvenile compositions of his. (The argument is not at all a pedantic one. Tests of style of this kind, if carried out thoroughly and sanely, are of the highest value in determining authorship. It is by these means, for example, that the non-Shakespearean authorship of 'Titus Andronicus' has at last been placed beyond dispute.) It is clearly the duty of those who contend that Bach is the composer of these works to prove their case and to answer every objection that negative criticism can bring against it. In some instances no original autograph exists. Some manuscripts do indeed bear Bach's name, but that, as Spitta himself recognised, is no proof of authenticity. Two of his reasons for attributing the 'Luke' Passion to Bach were that a manuscript exists in Bach's writing, and that though this 'bears no express notice that this is his own composition, on the other hand we find on the title the letters J.J. (Jesu Juva), which Bach was accustomed to add only to his own works, and not to copies from those of other composers.' To this Schreyer rejoins that 'the greater part of the supposed autograph of the 'Luke' Passion is not in Bach's writing'—for which belief he proceeds to give cogent reasons—and that, as Prieger has shown, the letters J.J. occur on at least eleven compositions by other men that Bach has simply copied; to which Professor Buchmayer adds that they are to be found on the title-pages of church music before the time of Bach, and that it is not even certain that they stand for 'Jesu Juva.' Their evidential value is therefore plainly slight. When there is a total lack of any real external evidence for the Bachian authorship of a certain work, and moreover the work itself contains numerous examples of a contrapuntal slovenliness to which there is no parallel in the genuine works of Bach, we are, so Schreyer maintains, justified in rejecting it. He would thus score out the 'Eight Little Preludes and Fugues' for the organ, the three Sonatas for flute and general bass, the last of the six Violin sonatas, and the Fugue in G minor for violin and general bass. It is impossible, with all one's respect for Spitta, to overlook the errors of musical judgment, and the proneness to jump at historical conclusions, that his remarks on some of these works exhibit. A cursory examination of the 'Eight Little Preludes and Fugues,' one would have thought, would have prevented him from declaring the style of them to be 'masterly.' In the violin Fugue in G minor the writing is at times exceptionally crude. How many works, we are bound to ask ourselves, have been included in the Bachgesellschaft edition on an arbitrary certification of their genuineness by Spitta or someone else, after a quite insufficient examination of the evidence for and against them? The larger part of the musical world, from Mendelssohn to Sir Hubert Parry, has decided, for example, that the 'Luke' Passion is not by Bach. It was forced upon the Bachgesellschaft by Spitta against the opposition of many of the leading musicians of that day, including Brahms.* As we have seen, Spitta's examination of the manuscript could not have been a very critical one. Mendelssohn, like Brahms, had detected the badness of the style of some of it, though he apparently had not done much more than skim the manuscript. Spitta seemingly was unaware of the crudity of the style, for he expressly says that 'we cannot deny the accuracy [Sorgfältigkeit] of the writing in the chorales.' Moreover Schreyer affirms that the worst is not known to the general public, for Dörffel, who edited the work for the Bachgesellschaft, has himself corrected many of the grossest errors in the manuscript. He also disputes the authenticity of the larger Notenbüchlein of Anna Magdalena Bach. Here again he has examined the manuscript carefully, and decides that the Bachgesellschaft edition of it—for which Count Waldersee is responsible—is so bad a reproduction as to be simply 'a caricature of a critical edition.' Were it to be faithfully reproduced, he says, every one could see that the collection could not have been put together under Bach's eyes.† Altogether Schreyer seems justified in claiming that 'a great deal yet remains to be done with regard to the critical scrutiny of Bach.' The first essential is that there should be no more 'editing' of Bach's works, or of works attributed to him. The manuscripts should be printed exactly as they are, and suggested editorial amendments confined to prefaces or foot-notes. Only in this way can we be sure of having the proper data to go upon in our inquiries. A fresh expert examination should also be made of every manuscript the authenticity of which is not beyond dispute.

*'I cannot see the slightest evidence,' he wrote, 'that this Passion is a Bach manuscript, and I would not stir a hand to have it appear under his name. The perpetually faulty contrapuntal writing, the bad declamation, the illogical modulations, all show quite clearly that Bach could not have written it.

† Schreyer also runs counter to the received opinion in contending that the Albinoni sonata, which is supposed to represent Bach's way of realising figured basses (See Spitta II. 293, and III. 388 ff.) cannot really have been corrected throughout by him.

III.

Meanwhile we may congratulate ourselves on the vitality of the general Bach criticism of recent years, and the new lines of thought that some of it has opened out. Two great books,—those of Albert Schweitzer‡ and André Pirro§ have largely transformed the older notions of the æsthetic basis of Bach's music. The tendency for the last decade or so has been to delve deeper and deeper into his vocal works, and to look there for a key that will unlock not only these but a number of the instrumental works as well. Bach the musical poet now bulks more largely even than Bach the master of architectonics. The first significant study of this kind was perhaps that of Arnold Schering.‖

He pointed out the constant reaction of the poetic side of Bach's mind upon the musical—how he loved to 'preach' in music upon the texts given him in the cantatas, the variety of poetic conception he exhibits, his Romantic sense of something 'beyond' music that nevertheless has to be expressed in it, the many ways in which he treats the chorale and the symbolism he imports into it,¶ and so on. The full extent of the influence upon Bach of what may be called literary or pictorial images was only revealed, however, in the books of Schweitzer and Pirro. The tendency among æstheticians had hitherto been to minimise the importance of the words in what was comprehensively called the old music. In an article in the New Music Review for September, 1908, on 'The Relative Importance of the Verbal Factor in Classical Vocal Music,' Dr. Ernest Walker argued that the modern passion for accurate musical characterization of the words is a new thing,—that 'the great classical composers . . . . never troubled about words to this extent,' especially in choral music, that Monteverde's practice of verbal emphasis represented 'merely an eddy in the stream of musical development,' that Bach's occasional adaptation of the same piece of music to two different sets of words shows him to have had no strong views on the matter, his 'main business' being simply 'to write magnificent music,' and that to Bach 'words were in the long run a hindrance rather than a help.' This view will hardly stand historical investigation. Not only did Bach deliberately aim at finding a musical phrase that should be the exact counterpart of this or that sentence or even word, but his predecessors and contemporaries did the same thing, and the theorists insisted upon the necessity of it. Wolfgang Caspar Printz, in 1696, says that a composer should not only observe the general sense of his text but express each word of it in such a way that 'the tones shall seem to say again what the words signify'—though of course he is not to illustrate isolated words to the detriment of the sense of the passage as a whole.* Daniel Speer, in his 'Grundrichtiger . . . Unterricht der musikalischen Kunst' (1697), shows how and why the composer should throw salient words into relief. It was a general rule that in expressive passages the natural inflections of the speaking voice should be observed as far as possible. The works of one composer after another—besides Bach—show that they took the most scrupulous care to translate words and images into tone, often in ways that seem primitive to us. Important words were driven home to the hearer's consciousness by repetition—a device which Mattheson expressly recommends in his 'Neue Göttingische Ephorus.' Mithobius, in 1665, commended composers for this kind of repetition 'in motets and concertos.' Calvisius, in 1592, and Crüger, in 1624, advise the use of harsh harmonies where the sense of the words can be expressed in no other way. Scheibe insists (1739) that the words should be distinctly audible, even in choruses. Schütz and his successors often inflect their musical phrase in order to make it a graphic illustration of a particular word. Schütz, for instance, gives a long-held tone to 'æternum,'† and renders 'inclina aurem tuam' by a descending melody, while the words 'accelera ut eruas me,' are set to 'accelerated' notes.‡ At the words 'und hernach lange sitzet,' in his motet, 'Wo der Herr nicht das Haus bauet,' the first syllable of the 'lange' is set to a slow ascending phrase of thirteen notes, while the would-be pictorial quality of the 'sitzet' is unmistakable, as it is again in the yawn on the word 'schlafend,' and in the phrase set to the word 'Pfeile' (arrows). Lasso, in one of his Penitential Psalms, tries to express the stubbornness of the mule by an unusual harmony.§ The Italian 'caccia' of the 14th century was full of tone-painting. In some of the 16th century madrigals, the words were graphically represented in tones—'crudele,' for example, being set to a dissonance, 'nuovo' to 'new' chromatic harmonies, 'correre' to a nimble 'passage,' and 'aspero' to consecutive fifths.‖ Evidence of this kind might be multiplied a hundredfold. The majority of the old composers, so far from finding words 'a hindrance rather than a help,' were often meticulously particular about the musical characterization of them.

IV.

But we shall be allowing ourselves to be led astray from the real point if we think of the question merely as one of words and music. The essential things are the images underlying the words, the suggestions at the back of them; and the true æsthetic interest of the question is in the light it throws on the old controversy over 'poetic' music and 'abstract' music—if we may adopt that crude and fallacious distinction for the sake of argument. The advocates of 'abstract' or 'absolute' music have always held that this is the pure, original form of the art, and that poetic music, pictorial music, programme music, or whatever else we choose to call it, is a mere by-product, the temporary aberration of an inferior musical mind here and there. The truth rather seems to be that there has scarcely ever been a composer of any value who has not, at some time or other, tried to make his music the expression of what may be called—again merely for the sake of argument—extra-musical concepts; the plain reason being that, as a composer's experience of life largely comes to him through his eyes and his ears, only a man enclosed in a soundless and viewless room from his birth could be expected to write music that would not be the conscious or unconscious limning of such experiences. All attempts to shut up the 'musical mind' in a kind of watertight and air-tight compartment from all the other faculties of the same brain are not only the poorest of poor psychology, but are condemned by the practice of composers themselves. These depraved fellows, ignorant of the necessity of conforming to certain supposed laws of æsthetics, are constantly doing what the æstheticians say they should not and cannot do,—translating the outer world and its spatial symbols into the internal, non-spatial language of tone. One of the most interesting features of Pirro's book is the detailed demonstration of this practice among the predecessors and contemporaries of Bach. The simplest form of symbolism, of course, is the suggestion of 'up' and 'down' by ascending and descending phrases respectively. From these external concepts it was an easy transition to more internal ones of a similar nature; ascending phrases were used to suggest ideas of awakening, pride, courage, strength, and descending phrases to suggest ideas of discouragement, depression, humility, poverty, sin, and so on. These old composers even ventured upon a kind of musical symbolism from which the hardiest of realists of to-day would shrink. There was no spatial concept that they did not feel it possible for music to suggest. 'Far' or 'wide' is represented by a great leap in the melody. 'The whole' is expressed by a phrase revolving within an octave, the old idea being that the octave was 'the mother of all the intervals.' When Bach, for example, comes across such words as 'the whole world,' he sets them in this way to notes of which the upper and lower limits form an octave. 'Here' and 'there,' or 'right' and 'left,' are represented quasi-visually by two phrases set, as it were, one on either side of a pivot. The idea of 'reciprocity' is conveyed by reversing a phrase; when Bach, in the cantata 'Barmherziges Herze der ewigen Liebe,' has to set the Biblical passage telling us that according as we measure so shall it be meted out to us again, he makes the second half of the melody an inverted image of the first half. The concept of 'surrounding'—and, by analogy, of such things as crowns or garlands—is represented by 'circular' or undulating themes. Every one knows the curvilinear themes by which Bach suggests serpents or dragons, or Satan in his capacity as deceiver. Concepts of 'standing,' 'remaining,' 'steadfastness'—and, by analogy, of faith—are represented by long-held notes. And so on in hundreds of other cases for which abundant evidence can be cited from Bach, Schütz, Erlebach, Franck, Krieger, Theile, Buxtehude, Kerl, Keiser, Hammerschmidt, Kuhnau, and a score of other composers.

All students knew that examples of this 'realism' could be found here and there in the old masters; but until the results of the thorough research of Schweitzer and Pirro were put before us, no one realised the extent to which Bach and his predecessors were preoccupied with this musical symbolism. It is now clear enough that Bach, in this as in everything else, pressed the æsthetic principles of his epoch to their utmost. Schweitzer and Pirro prove conclusively that so far from being the most 'abstract' of musicians he is the most 'poetic' or 'pictorial.' His realism is astounding; and so bent is he upon it that if a line or a verse offers him an opportunity for 'painting' he will seize upon it to the occasional neglect of the sentiment of the passage as a whole. So fundamental in him was the disposition to correlate music with literary or pictorial ideas that the same verbal image is generally sufficient to evoke the same—or a similar—musical phrase. Hence arises that system of 'motives' that Schweitzer and Pirro unfold before us at such length,—generic types of melody or of rhythm that can be classified as symbolizing 'joy,' or 'grief,' or 'terror,' or 'majesty,' or 'peace,' or 'exhaustion,' or 'walking,' or 'felicity,' &c. Sometimes two motives will be used in co-operation to express a double idea, or to suggest the conclusion one is expected to draw from it. These discoveries throw a new light upon not only the vocal but the instrumental music. The organ chorale preludes yield up some of their long and jealously-held secrets to us. In his preface to Schweitzer's book, C. M. Widor tells us his own experiences in this respect. He had always felt that there was something insolubly enigmatic in these works. 'Bach's musical logic in the preludes and fugues is quite simple and clear; but it becomes cloudy as soon as he takes up a chorale melody. Why these sometimes almost excessively abrupt antitheses of feeling? Why does he add contrapuntal motives to a chorale melody that have often no relation to the mood of the melody? Why all these incomprehensible things in the plan and the working-out of these fantasies? The more I study them the less I understand them.' Whereupon his young pupil, Schweitzer, showed him that the explanation of all these apparently strange turns of Bach's imagination was to be found in the texts of the chorales that Bach had in his mind at the time of writing. 'Thus,' says Widor, 'I made the acquaintance of a Bach of whose existence I had previously had only the dimmest suspicion. In a flash it became clear to me that the cantor of St. Thomas's was much more than an incomparable contrapuntist . . . . and that his work exhibits an unparalleled desire and capacity for expressing poetic ideas and for bringing word and tone into unity.' Many things in the clavier and orchestral works also become clearer when read in the light of this symbolism, and one has only to read Schweitzer's chapter on the 'Matthew' Passion, or the solid book of Alfred Heuss on the same subject, to realise how many passages in that work that were once so hard to understand are now perfectly transparent to us.

V.

I have been able to give only the barest summary of the main thesis of the books of Schweitzer and Pirro,* compressing into a few lines a demonstration that fills hundreds of pages and is supported by copious musical quotations. Even from this résumé, however, it will be seen that many of the current ideas upon musical æsthetics, and particularly upon the supposed superiority of 'absolute' to poetic and pictorial music, will have to be revised. Bach, in fact, has been too long forced to fight in the ranks of an army with whose cause he would have had little sympathy. Of all the older commentators, Mosevius alone (in the middle of the 19th century) appears to have seen how essentially pictorial and symbolical the composer's style was. By the time Spitta came to write, musical Europe was violently divided upon the subject of the true nature and ideal of music. On the one hand were Wagner and Liszt and the 'New German' school, bent on 'fertilizing music with poetry.' On the other hand were the 'classicists,' who held that their opponents were decoying music to its destruction, and that its salvation lay in its remaining 'purely musical,' unsullied by contact with literature and external things. It was not for nothing that Spitta was brought up in Berlin, a city that prided itself on its opposition to Weimar and the Wagner-Liszt spirit. The 'classicists' wanted a great banner to fight under. They chose that of Bach as being perhaps the greatest of all; and poor Bach, the most restless and uncompromising of 'realists' and 'poetic musicians,' was held up as the supreme example of the 'abstract' musical imagination, a blessing to his own side and a warning to the other. Spitta, it is true, was compelled every now and then to admit the composer's pictorialism; but he did all he could to minimise it, sometimes passing it off as a mere piece of 'quaintness.' 'Ready as Bach was,' he says, 'to sprinkle his works with picturesque figures, he did not do so as a result of fundamental principles based on a sense of the graphic power of music.' [This, however, is precisely what he did do.]

* It is very curious that these two students should have hit upon the same ideas at the same time, and quite independently of each other. It is a piquant reflection also that it should have been left to two French writers to see most penetratingly into the soul of the German Bach.

'Those figures are transient flashes' [in reality they permeate his whole work], 'and their presence or absence cannot alter the value or intelligibility of the composition in its integrity. In studying Bach, when we meet with some conspicuously melodious line or some strikingly harmonious tune that happens (sic!) to coincide with an emphatic or emotional word, we are too ready to attribute to them a much closer and deeper connection than can ever have dwelt in the purpose of the composer.' Schweitzer happily compares this temperamental unwillingness to recognise a plain but distasteful fact with some of the arguments by which a certain order of philosopher tries to close his eyes to the interdependence of the mental and the physical functions of the body. 'It reminds us,' he says, 'of the famous Dutch philosopher, Geulinx, whose dread of philosophical materialism was so great that he would not admit any influence of the thought and the will upon the movements of the limbs, and held that God had regulated the body and the soul like two absolutely parallel pieces of clockwork, so that the same thing would always happen at precisely the same time in the corporeal sphere and in the physical. Thus what seemed explicable, from the external standpoint, only by a direct connection of the two, was really the coincidence, predestined from eternity, of a mental idea and a bodily movement. In the same way Spitta's dread of musical materialism absolved him from the necessity of a careful inquiry into the connection of word and tone in Bach by a few authoritative dicta upon the "true nature of the art."' Something of the same attitude is adopted in Sir Hubert Parry's 'Bach' (1909). The failure to take account of the new research is almost the only blot upon that admirable book—the work of one who is at once musician and thinker. Sir Hubert Parry tries to dispose of Bach's realism with some such remark as that it is 'quaint' or 'semi-humorous.' The day has for ever gone by for condescension of that kind. Bach's realism and poetic symbolism will have to be reckoned with seriously by all future æstheticians, and their bearing upon modern programme music carefully estimated.

VI.

It is hardly to be expected that those to whom the results of Schweitzer's and Pirro's research are constitutionally unpalatable will accept them readily and frankly. Human nature is not always so candid as that. The primary impulse will be to pooh-pooh it all,—an operation interesting in itself, perhaps, but not likely to impress the more open-minded reader. When a certain Frenchman was told that the facts were against him he replied, 'So much the worse for the facts.' That was heroic, but it is not on record that the facts were observed to blench. No amount of ostrich-like digging of conservative heads into the sand will prevent these new data from being clearly visible to people willing and anxious to use their own eyes. An apparently more profitable line will be to try to minimise the importance of the thesis by picking a tiny hole in it here and there. This will not be at all hard to do. It is inevitable that Schweitzer and Pirro, flushed with their discoveries, should now and then exaggerate the range of them, or embark upon conjectures that in the nature of the case are not capable of strict proof. This is the opportunity for the clever doubter. If a stock has been over 'bulled,' there is always a fair chance of some success in a bold 'bear' movement. This line has been already taken by M. Gustave Robert in a treatise, mostly quite well argued, on 'Le Descriptif chez Bach.'* The case can hardly be better put than it is here, yet it breaks down completely. M. Robert's bias, to begin with, is too evident. He has a certain horror of the descriptive in music; and one's experience of æstheticians of this class is that their reason, however good it is, cannot always rise superior to their prejudices. He objects to a 'system' being attributed to Bach, just as Wolfrum† objects to his recurrent melodic and rhythmic formulæ being labelled 'motives.' This is merely quarrelling over words. We are bound to have some concentrated description of the observed facts, and no one word could be quite free from objection. But call the facts by what name we like, the facts themselves are indisputable. M. Robert does no more than assail the extremity of the fringe of them, giving occasional reasons for thinking, for example, that Pirro has attributed the wrong intentions to Bach. Now and then he cuts himself with his own razor. He argues, for instance, that this 'motive' does not represent waves but tears, and that one not the sea but hunting,—which at the most clears Bach of the suspicion of one descriptive purpose only to fasten on him another. He points out, quite justly, that there is no need to assume that the expression of grief is intended every time the chromatic 'motive' is used; sometimes it is plainly a mere factor in the scheme of harmonization. But when all allowance is made for what is right in these objections, the main structure of the thesis of Pirro and Schweitzer is affected no more than a house would be by the removal of a superfluous brick here or of a fragment of excessive ornament there.

The next step is to re-adjust some of our æsthetic theories in accordance with the new facts. It will no longer be possible to sneer in the old patronising way at realism and programme music, and all the other bugbears of the conservatives; the fact that a mind like Bach's should have been so devoted to the pictorial is of itself a condonation of that passion in others,—if condonation be needed. Here many of us would be inclined to go further than Schweitzer, whose sympathies are evidently not with programme music of the type of that of Strauss. But one has only to carry his own æsthetic analysis a little further to find the same justification for modern pictorial and poetic music that he finds for the pictorialism and symbolism of Bach. Schweitzer rightly points out the crude fallacy of speaking of 'the musical faculty' as if it were a separate entity, one and indivisible. As he shows from concrete cases, there is in every artist, in addition to the basic construction that makes him poet or painter or musician, a certain admixture of the psychological processes of thinkers in the other arts. Some poets, like Goethe, have the painter's eye; others, like Schiller, lack this clarity of external vision, the moods of their work being more akin to music. Painters, in the same way, lean some towards music, some towards poetry. And any one who thinks for a moment can see that musicians vary just to the extent to which their fundamental musical thinking is coloured or not by literary or pictorial associations. Mozart is more 'abstract' than Schubert or Bach, who are constantly aiming at the suggestion of external things. This being so, it is as absurd to lay it down that only one particular cast of mind is the 'truly musical' cast as to say that only one of the many orders of poetic imagination can be the 'truly poetical.' The objection to programme music generally comes from people whose imaginations have not the power to reproduce the series of visual images that the composer wishes his music to evoke. Wagner's mind was of this order; he could not follow a sequence of literary or pictorial 'moments' in music except in the form of a stage setting. His music is programme music with scenery; but the limitations of his conceptual faculty are no good reason why a composer with an imagination of another order, like Strauss's, should not dispense with the visible props to his music that Wagner could not do without. We work back once more to the old position that after all there are only two kinds of music,—good and bad. Pictorialism—using the term in its broadest sense to denote all translations of phenomena and events and the sequences of them into music—is per se neither good nor bad, any more than poetical description is good or bad per se. Everything depends upon how it is done. Bach frequently went to excess; and at the other end of the line of development we can see Strauss doing flatly absurd things, as when he makes the orchestra in the 'Rosenkavalier' strike twelve at the mere mention of midnight in the text, or when he talks of being able to 'express a knife and fork in music.' The central, unshakable fact is that many of the greatest musical minds do work spontaneously and delightedly in this quasi-pictorial medium. Nor will it do to lay it down that the principle should be carried no further than it is by Bach, who will indeed frame his theme to 'represent' this or that external thing, but afterwards work it out on 'purely musical' lines, not attempting to reproduce the changing details of a story in the manner of Strauss and the moderns generally. What may not have lain within the boundaries of Bach's purpose and means do not necessarily lie outside ours; music has surely expanded its resources and its ideals in the couple of centuries that have elapsed since his day. In any case we may be sure that great musical minds will work in their own way in the future as they have done in the past, obeying instinctively the laws of their own being without the slightest regard for what this æsthetician or that may assert to be 'the true nature' of music, and that after our having seen the folly of using Bach, quite illegitimately, to prop up one infirm æsthetic theory, it will not do to use him now, with no more than the barest pretence of legitimacy, to prop up a theory no less infirm, no less rooted in the mere constitutional prejudices of this theoretician or that. Of all people Bach must not be used to bar the path of progress.*

* Paris, 1909. † "Johann Sebastian Bach," Leipsic, 1910. 2 vols.

* I regret that limitations of space prevent me from considering in detail certain other interesting books on Bach, such as those of Sir Hubert Parry and Philipp Wolfrum. The latter treats the subject of Bach's church music and that of his predecessors with exceptional ability; it is a department of German musical history on which Wolfrum is a recognised authority. Unfortunately his book is marred by a tone of ill-temper and even of insult towards Schweitzer that suggests a personal animus. He never gives Schweitzer the least credit for anything, and is incessantly going out of his way to pick a quarrel with him on any slight pretext or on none. It is an unedifying spectacle, reminding us of a little dog yapping and snapping at the tail of a big one. There is a harmless and good-tempered joke at Wolfrum's expense in Schweitzer's book; but it is incredible that this should have incensed him to the point of forgetting literary decency as often as he does in his own volumes.

A FRENCH BIOGRAPHY OF GOUNOD.†

By M.-D. Calvocoressi.

Gounod, although one of the most popular among French composers, and at the same time one whose importance and influence on modern music are impossible to deny, has until now been made the subject of very few books of biography or of criticism. To the scanty literature available on him and his music, the biography in two volumes, written by Messrs. J. G. Prod'homme and A. Dandelot, proves a welcome and valuable addition. It is strictly biographical, and the authors have refrained from giving the slightest critical appreciation of Gounod's works, æsthetics or influence. But as such it is complete enough to deserve being considered as hardly to be improved upon.

The composer's ancestry, by a plausible and, I believe, novel hypothesis, is traced back as far as to a certain Jean Gounod or Gounoz, born at Besançon towards the middle of the 16th century, and whose great-grandson probably was Antoine Gounod, 'furbisher to the King of France' in 1730, and Charles Gounod's, the composer's, great-grandfather. The life of Gounod is very thoroughly narrated with a wealth of documentary evidence, the greater part of which is absolutely new. The authors have searched with care through all that could help to elucidate the events of this life down to minutest details, or correlative questions through official registers, records, legal documents, periodicals, correspondences, &c. As far as can be judged by reading their book and comparing it with other works on the same subject, they have succeeded in remaining strictly impartial.

This of course ought to be the very first quality of a work from which all attempt at criticism is avowedly excluded, and therefore to call for no particular commendation. But examples of prejudiced biographies that include the sins of omission and commission alike, and in which facts are interpreted or even 'arranged' so as to fall in with preconceived critical or other judgments, are by no means uncommon.* So that Messrs. Prod'homme and Dandelot deserve special praise for not having deviated in the least from their scheme of impersonally stating the facts, and for having stated them in a spirited and attractive way that makes the book most readable.

It should at once be added that if the authors have given utterance to no opinion of their own, their work is none the less instructive from the critical point of view; and their policy of leaving facts to speak for themselves has led to striking results indeed.

Almost all judges—the exception concerning only a few uncompromising dogmatists—concur in an opinion expressed by M. Saint-Saëns in his preface to the book, that Gounod was the first who 'attempted to do in France what Mozart had so happily accomplished in Austria—an opera that should be at the same time vocal and instrumental, melodic and symphonic'; that he strove to reach truth, earnestness, and intensity in musical expression and style, proving in that respect far ahead of his French contemporaries. How meritorious, indeed, his persevering attempts were in such times and among such surroundings is made clear owing to the method adopted by the authors of extensively quoting from contemporary reviews of Gounod's greater works. These quotations suffice to give a vivid picture of what musical life and opinion were in France during the 'fifties and 'sixties, i.e., at the time of Gounod's most strenuous efforts, and of his writing 'Faust,' 'La Reine de Saba,' 'Mireille, 'Roméo et Juliette.' Then reigned, unchallenged, Adolphe Adam, Meyerbeer, Halévy, and many others whose very names are now forgotten. Neither Berlioz's music, nor the roads that it opened, nor his own appeals in favour of some of the higher forms of musical art, attracted any notice to speak of. Little attention was paid to the classics. The message of Beethoven's last masterpieces remained thoroughly ignored, and the public very little enlightened by word or by deed: the leading critics often revelled in pouring abuse upon the 'last manner' of Beethoven, as well as upon the works of Schumann, Wagner or Mendelssohn. For instance, when Gounod's 'La Reine de Saba' appeared (1862), Scudo, the critic of the influent and dignified Revue des Deux-Mondes, wrote, 'The composer deserves even greater blame if his opera is the outcome of a system, the work of an imitator of Mr. Wagner, of Robert Schumann, of the infirmities of Beethoven's genius. We know that the ingenious but weak spirit of Mr. Gounod is unfortunate enough to admire certain corrupt parts of Beethoven's last Quartettes. From that tainted spring have issued all the bad musicians of modern Germany, be they Liszt, Wagner, Schumann, or even, on account of certain equivocal things in his style, Mendelssohn.'

Who should wonder that, such being the case, pleas in favour of outraged melody, purity of style, and sense of beauty should have been made on the occasion of every new work by Gounod, and that the composer should have been treated exactly in the same way as other innovators both of older and of more recent times? In truth, France, which during fifty years has made such incredible progress in musical matters and musical creations, is bound greatly to honour the memories of the few who, reacting against tendencies so nefarious, are to be deemed among the originators of her modern progress. The question of Gounod's actual import as an innovator, untouched in the book under notice, has not yet been seriously studied, and might well form the theme of a properly critical work. A few years ago, when the French critical mind was temporarily almost swept away in the great Wagnerian current—excessive, but beneficent in more respects than one—many strange and unjust things were said of Gounod. Formerly abused as a follower of Wagner, the composer fared even worse in the hands of the ultra-Wagnerians, who treated his art as they were wont to treat the art of Ambroise Thomas, Meyerbeer, or Halévy. He still has a few relentless opponents in France; but the majority of critics, though far from adopting towards him the popular attitude of wholesale worship, agree to acknowledge his merits as a creator. He undoubtedly has many defects and great ones, the chief of which are his insipid sentimentality and his inability to discard certain trite formulæ, certain trivialities, some of which assuredly were natural to him, whilst others resulted from surrounding influences. But on the other side he is remarkable for many intrinsic qualities, proving him to be both an inventor and an artist of taste and feeling. Even if his works include a great deal that is worthless, or even bad, musical art has become richer owing to them. And they contain music that may appeal even to admirers of Moussorgsky, Debussy, and Ravel. His influence on artists like Lalo, Saint-Saëns, —even, perhaps, though to a limited extent, on César Franck,—on lesser musicians like Bizet and Delibes, on M. Massenet, and through them all on the younger generation is easily discernible, and will certainly be studied some day.

It remains to say that Messrs. Prod'homme and Dandelot's book has some appropriate illustrations, and that the complete* catalogue of Gounod's works placed at the end is likely to prove a surprise to many readers.

* In his remarkable book on Beethoven, M. Vincent d'Indy has just attempted to show—and succeeded in showing—through incontrovertible documents that 'romantic biographers, stricken to excess with the passion of woe,' have perverted more than one fact of the master's life.

* We note the omission of the very popular song, 'There is a green hill far away.'—[Ed. M. T.]

In response to inquiries received as to the genuineness of the music described by Mr. Frederick Corder in his article in our last number on 'An Epoch-making Composer,' we have to state that the work criticised is published by Messrs. Breitkopf & Härtel.

ALBERTO RANDEGGER,

Born April 13, 1832; Died December 18, 1911.

With much regret we have to record that Mr. Alberto Randegger died at his residence, 5, Nottingham Place, London, W., on Monday morning, December 18. As we gave, in our issue for October, 1899, a full sketch of the late musician's career, we need now only refer to its leading events. We reproduce (by the kind permission of Messrs. Elliott & Fry) the portrait that we gave with the above article.

Alberto Randegger was born at Trieste, on April 13, 1832. His father was a schoolmaster, and his mother, who claimed Tuscan parentage, was an amateur musician. In his early childhood Alberto displayed no special talent for music, but when he was about thirteen years of age, his slumbering faculties awoke. He then studied the pianoforte under several teachers in turn, and he became a pupil of Luigi Ricci, of Trieste, in composition. In 1850 he made the acquaintance of Verdi, and by the time he was nineteen he had composed several Masses for the church and ballets for the opera. During 1852-54 he conducted the opera at Fiume, Zara, Sinigaglia, Brescia and Venice. A tragic opera, 'Bianca Capello,' was one of the fruits of this period. This work was performed at Brescia and Trieste. Then he was engaged to conduct a season of Italian opera in New York, but, as cholera broke out there, the project was abandoned and he went to Paris instead, and stayed with his eldest brother, who suggested a visit to London. Randegger made the journey, and it says much for the fascination of the great metropolis that from that time until his death he resided here. An introduction to Costa helped him to get experience of musical matters in England. He took lessons in composition from Bernhard Molique, who was then in London, and in 1853 he conducted a series of Opera Buffa performances at St. James's Theatre. This led to other engagements, one of which was the organistship of St. Paul's Church, Avenue Road, Regent's Park, a position he retained for eleven years. Randegger was now persona grata in English musical circles, and his services as singing teacher, conductor, and composer were in constant demand. In 1864, his operetta 'The rival beauties' was performed at Leeds with great success. It was in this work that Mr. (now Dr.) W. H. Cummings made his first appearance on a public stage. In 1868 Randegger was appointed a professor of singing at the Royal Academy of Music, and later he was engaged in this capacity at the Royal College. He held both posts until his death. In 1873, his dramatic cantata 'Fridolin' (the libretto of which is by Madame Rudersdorff, then well-known as a singer) was produced at the Birmingham Festival, and in 1880 he conducted a Carl Rosa Company season of opera in English at Her Majesty's Theatre. In 1881, on the resignation of Sir Julius Benedict, Randegger became conductor of the Norwich Musical Festival, and he held this important post until his retirement in 1905. From 1889 until 1898 he conducted grand opera at Drury Lane and Covent Garden, under the régime of Sir Augustus Harris. He was also conductor of the Queen's Hall Choral Society for two seasons (1895-97) and of the Queen's Hall Orchestra at a series of Sunday concerts. In addition to the works already named, Randegger composed a vocal scene, 'Medea'; a soprano solo, 'Saffo'; a setting of the 150th Psalm (written for the Boston (U.S.A.) Musical Festival), 1872; and a scena for Mr. Edward Lloyd (performed at the Philharmonic Society, June 9, 1887). Many of his smaller compositions, songs, &c., have become very popular, but he is best known to vocalists all over the world by his famous Primer on Singing (in Novello's Primer Series), which has had an extraordinary sale. Then as a teacher of répertoire solo-singing his reputation drew gifted pupils from far and near. He had carefully studied the traditional interpretation of the great oratorio singers, and was therefore able to impart invaluable instruction to the coming generation of artists. During late years much of his time was given up to the editing of a series of classic songs, and he was thus able to hand down—so far as is possible by printed directions—the fruits of his almost unrivalled experience.

Randegger had many social qualities that endeared him to a great number of devoted friends. There was a full measure of the milk of human kindness in his nature. Although not an Englishman by birth, no one of his contemporaries was more assiduous than he in supporting British music. He was an outspoken critic, but his judgment always had a sound basis that carried conviction. His influence, direct and indirect, in forming the style and guiding the temperament of English-speaking singers was very great.

A memorial service, which was attended by many musicians and other friends of the deceased, was conducted by Canon Sheppard, D.D. (Subdean of the Chapels Royal), at Marylebone Church on December 21. The remains of the deceased were cremated at Golders Green.

Occasional Notes.

In a letter we print on p. 33, Dr. E. W. Naylor comments upon the recent discussion of the metronome rate of the Trio in Beethoven's Choral Symphony about which we wrote last month (p. 783). He says he has no confidence in the revised metronome rate (minim equal M. 116), and he argues that the movement should be taken faster but not nearly at the rate formerly marked, namely, semibreve equal M. 116. In this connection it is interesting to note that the students of the Royal College of Music gave, on December 14, a performance of the whole Symphony under Sir Charles Stanford. The Times in its criticism says:

> The concert which the students of the Royal College of Music gave in their Concert Hall last night was designed to complete the task begun by Sir C. V. Stanford in his recent letters to The Times of correcting the errors which have crept into the score of Beethoven's ninth Symphony by giving a practical demonstration of the right way of playing it. Special interest naturally centred upon the Scherzo and Trio with which the letters were principally concerned, and as it was played last night several points were indicated with perfect clearness. The first was that the Trio gains immensely in beauty and as a contrast to what has preceded it by the slower time, and its second theme played by the violoncellos becomes extraordinarily eloquent in these conditions. In the second place, Sir Charles Stanford proved that the stringendo which leads up to the Trio is perfectly in place, and its effect is very much heightened by sinking back to the quieter tempo; and, lastly, nobody who heard it last night could doubt, as some have doubted, that conductors have attempted to play the Trio at double its proper pace, even though possibly they have not succeeded.

The italics are our own. The argument that the playing of the movement at the assumed proper pace proves that conductors have attempted to play it at double its proper pace is a non sequitur. We are amongst the doubters as to whether any conductor has attempted to get the movement played minim = M. 232 or semibreve = M. 116. Can any of our readers recall such an unforgettable experience?

In the Western Mail for December 8, a proposition to establish a National College of Music for Wales is explained and discussed by Mr. Harry Evans and Mr. Tom Evans. The idea of thus catering for the musical needs of Wales is not a new one, but the difficulty of providing ways and means has, so far, been a fatal obstacle to realisation. It is, however, claimed that the new project is a practicable one under which 'no one is asked to subscribe a penny—not at first, at any rate.' This discovery of a philosopher's stone is interesting, startling and novel. The promoters first point out that it is generally known [not so well as it should be, we should say] that several 'unsatisfactory' examining bodies have reaped a rich harvest in Wales by issuing certificates which are, from the point of view of a guarantee of merit, 'perfectly worthless.' Then follows a caustic statement that the most important part of these examinations, so far as some of the examining bodies are concerned, is the payment of a fee. It is calculated that during the last twenty years many thousands of pounds have been in this way paid by Welsh parents. It is suggested that a strong examining board—consisting of all the leading Welsh musicians—should be formed in Wales, and that experts outside the board should be engaged as examiners. All the fees received from candidates, less necessary expenses, would be kept for the establishment of a Welsh College of Music. It is stated that the scheme is not intended to supplant the established and recognised examining bodies.

It is certain that some scheme for the musical salvation of Wales is long overdue. The race is notoriously gifted musically, yet it lags behind in the march of progress. The Eisteddfod is almost the sole objective of the people. This is not their fault, for the simple reason that there is practically no other vent for their inward musical fire. They suffer from an insularity all the more insidious because it is so unconscious. Therefore the friends of Wales must welcome any national scheme designed to widen the musical outlook of the nation. Whether the bold proposal described above is likely to effect this object remains to be seen. It involves a self-denying ordinance on the part of Welsh musicians, but we have no doubt their patriotism will rise to the occasion. An adjustment of relations with the established and recognised examining bodies may cause some difficulty. But after all, the cause of progress is the greatest consideration.

In our correspondence columns recently we have printed some letters on the pregnant topic of vocal physiology. We have ventured into this domain with some trepidation, remembering that a mere whisper will sometimes bring down an avalanche. We hope our correspondents, and especially many others who have not yet written, will take it as a compliment that we duly note the curious, and to editors embarrassing, literary facility that comes of a study of the phenomena connected with voice-production. Discussions on this topic have raged in musical journals and elsewhere for a generation or two, and yet apparently the result is that we have merely ascertained our ignorance. We cannot help concluding that it would be more to the point for the voice-producers to produce the great singer and not to worry so much as to the public expression of how the thing ought to be done. Who knows or cares as to the theoretical views of the trainers of Miss Felice Lyne, the latest operatic find? No doubt these trainers—who, we understand, are Madame Marchesi and M. Daubigny—have views. But their results are the eloquent and convincing expression of their theories.

The situation is different when the methods of an unquestionably great teacher are misrepresented. Here some public explanation is due. The leading case of the 'coup de la glotte,' commonly known as the 'shock of the glottis,' is one in point. Mr. Hermann Klein, as a pupil of the great Garcia, was fully entitled to explain what his teacher meant and what he did not mean by his famous expression. Mr. Klein's lecture is reported on p. 34.

We remind our readers that an important Vacation Conference on Musical Education will be held on January 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, at St. Paul's School, Brook Green, Hammersmith, under the auspices of the Girls' School Music Union, the Music Teachers' Association, the Home Music Study Union, and the Union of Directors of Music in Secondary Schools. Lectures will be given by Dr. Somervell, Miss Kathleen O'Dowd (on the Jaques-Dalcroze method), Mr. Stewart Macpherson, Dr. R. Vaughan Williams, Mr. Fuller Maitland, Mr. Field Hyde, and Dr. Borland. The honorary secretary is Miss Cecilia Hill, Wentworth Hall, Mill Hill. 'Speech and Voice Training' is the subject of another conference, to be held at Bedford College, York Place, on January 15, 16 and 17, and at Portman Rooms on January 18 and 19. Miss Elsie Fogerty, the Hon. Mrs. Alfred Lyttelton, Dr. Hulbert, Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, Dr. Lierhammer, Madame Larkcom, Dr. Warner, Dr. John Adams, Dr. Aikin, Mr. Evlyn Howard-Jones and Mr. David Zeldenrust have promised to take part in the meetings. Information can be obtained from Miss Elsie Fogerty, 29, Queensberry Place, S.W.

THE NOVELLO CENTENARY.

COMMEMORATION BANQUET AT DE KEYSER'S HOTEL, ON WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1911.

In commemoration of the Centenary of the establishment of the Firm of Novello & Co. a public banquet, organized by a committee including nearly all the leading musicians of the country, was given to the Directors at De Keyser's Hotel, Victoria Embankment on December 6. The Right Hon. Sir T. VEZEY STRONG, K.C.V.O., late Lord Mayor of London, presided.

Grace was said by the Rev. F. A. W. HAMILTON-GELL, M.A., Mus. B., and after dinner 'Non nobis Domine' was sung by the assembled company.

THE CHAIRMAN then proposed the usual loyal toasts to The King and the Royal Family, and

Dr. T. LEA SOUTHGATE announced that he had received numerous letters and telegrams expressing the senders' regret at being unable to attend the banquet. Sir Edward Elgar, Prof. Niecks, Prof. Joseph C. Bridge, Prof. Granville Bantock, Dr. Walter Carroll, Prof. Sir Walter Parratt, Dr. Harford Lloyd, Dr. G. J. Bennett, Mr. Alderman Cooper, Sir George Truscott, Mr. Myles Birket Foster, M. M.-D. Calvocoressi (Paris), Prof. Sanford Terry (Aberdeen), and Mr. Ernest Newman were amongst those who sent messages.

Later in the evening a letter from Mr. Alberto Randegger was read. This letter has now derived a special and pathetic interest because of the lamented death of the writer on December 17. The following is the text:

5, Nottingham Place,
December 4.

MY DEAR FRIENDS ALFRED AND AUGUSTUS,

Here is what will probably be a rambling message, dictated by your old friend Randegger from his bed of sickness, where he has been lying helpless for four weeks. I wish to assure you that it is a great disappointment to me, that I am unable to be present at the interesting celebration on Wednesday next. A century is certainly a good long time—but a hundred years has not the same significance in every case! I have been closely connected with your great House for nearly half a century. I have watched its progress, admired its splendid management, rejoiced at its success. I remember with a great deal of pleasure the splendid hospitality I enjoyed at your parents' house, when we used to call your wonderful father by two distinctive names, 'Mr. Littleton at home' and 'Mr. Littleton in the office'—you have solidly established now a magnificent monument to the Art of Music. Your publications are known all over the musical world, and are justly esteemed as the most beautiful and reliable existing! Go on and prosper for many, many years to come! This is the hearty wish of your friend who regrets he can't shake hands with you on Wednesday. Please tell some of our mutual friends the reason of otherwise inexplicable absence.

Yours very affectionately,
ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

After the letters had been read, Sir T. VEZEY STRONG said:

It is now my great privilege to propose to this distinguished company of musicians the toast of the health of the House of Novello, coupled with the name of its senior partner, Mr. Alfred Littleton (cheers), and this in connection with the hundredth anniversary of the establishment of that Firm, an event so important, so unique in music, that the lovers of music, professional and amateur alike, have eagerly seized the occasion to offer to these gentlemen, the heads of that House, their congratulations upon all that they have achieved in the long past, and their best wishes for triumphs yet to be secured. I can understand your saying, Why on earth entrust this toast to our present Chairman? Has he ever composed an oratorio? Has he ever distinguished himself upon the organ? Has he ever attracted the masses by his solo singing? I am afraid to all those natural inquiries I should at once have to say unhesitatingly that I have no such qualifications. And yet that would not be strictly true, because I am a lover of music and, while not a musician in fact, I am by grace, being a member of the Musicians' Company (cheers), and that qualification,—coupled with the fact that until recently I enjoyed the great honour of holding the highest civic office in this country, and in that capacity, together with my dear wife, enjoyed the privilege of joining with the guests of this evening in offering some entertainment at the Mansion House to those who came from all parts of Europe, nay, from parts beyond those borders, to celebrate with us the Congress devoted to the consideration of music—constitutes the ground of my selection. In connection with each of these events I have ventured to offer my humble tribute of profound reverence for the divine attributes of music, and for their elevating and humanising influences in the service of man. Moreover, I have made grateful confession of the sweet and sustaining influence derived from the musical services at Westminster and St. Paul's, in the solemnities of the Coronation, and my faith in the abiding character of these spiritual forces in the great world-movement now in progress towards the 'universal harmony' of which I ventured to speak as flowing from an ever-enlarging conception of Christian civilization, and the development of the peaceful arts—of which music ranks highest and best, as speaking most widely a common language and expressing most deeply the emotions of the human heart. Among the larger movements indicating the trend of modern thought and higher statesmanship may well be remembered the great organization now preparing to celebrate a century of peace among English-speaking peoples, which will be completed on the anniversary of the signing of the Treaty of Ghent on Christmas Eve, 1914. Music is international, above and superior to all boundaries, it is independent of frontiers, it cares nothing for nationality, creeds nor colours. It is therefore the friend of all and a mighty and beneficent instrument in procuring and sustaining universal harmony. And that firm, or that man, or that institution that is privileged to take part in such a movement is worthy of being removed above the mere considerations of commerce, and being welcomed as benefactors of mankind (cheers). This occasion is the more important in that we are able to meet face to face the men who represent a great movement in the history of music. The development of music and the benefactors to whom I have referred must include the House and Partners of Novello (cheers). The history of the families of Novello and Littleton is at once typical of the growth of great enterprises by the force of great personalities, and also of the period of Britain's greatest advance in the peaceful arts and popular culture. The promotion of the musical art and all the cultural influence of popularised music owes more to the natural gifts, cultivated abilities, and the enlightened spirit of commercial enterprise of the Novellos and the Littletons than could ever be estimated—far less expressed on an occasion like this (cheers). In briefly sketching the hundred years of their existence I have only time to remark upon the rise and progress of the great musical movement with which the names of Novello and Littleton will ever be honourably identified. Whether we think of the musical talents and performances of Mr. Vincent Novello, the founder of the great House which bears his name, or of his son, Mr. Alfred Novello, or of the gifted sisters, Cecilia, Clara and Sabilla Novello, who as singers and teachers of music created love for music in the hearts of the people—or again, we think of the labours in the sphere of technical craftsmen and the practical administration of Mr. Henry Littleton, we are impressed with the thought of how magnificently those qualities have combined and co-operated in bringing about the great achievements on which it is our privilege to congratulate those noble workers and the world to-day. 'The benefactor' has been defined as the man who makes two blades of grass grow where only one was wont to grow. Here we have a race of benefactors, and a continuance of benefactions to the growth and enjoyment of music by the life and labours of the families of Novello and Littleton. From small beginnings the now world-wide operations, the reputation and the influence of the firm have been built up by pains-taking attention to every detail of the methods of printing, production and distributing music in forms suited to the successive development of the musical art and the growth of the uses of music at home and abroad, at such prices—and that is not an unimportant factor in the spread of music—as to remove music from the sphere of the privileged and of the few to the happy possession of the masses of the people (cheers). Up till the time of the early labours of Vincent Novello, no cheap music was available, and there were no cheap concerts for yielding general enjoyment or encouraging the study of music. On the contrary, music was the restricted pleasure of the rich. The Antient Concerts, which remained in vogue for some dozen years after Queen Victoria came to the throne, were restricted to persons of rank and conducted under rules which did not admit to the recognised programmes of the concerts the musical productions of any composers until twenty years after their death. The rule came finally to an end in 1848, and we find from that time forward a steady and widespread movement for the aid and encouragement of the teaching of music in schools, and its general use. Truly music speaks. How it thunders in wrath or soothes in its softness! How it strengthens and ennobles! How it nerves and encourages! It steals into a sick room and sweetly whispers hope, it gives courage in the hour of battle, it touches and sustains the very heart in the time of sorrow and bereavement; in frivolous mood it creates laughter, it storms at and condemns the guilty. And even in the death chamber we realise that 'Music softer on the spirit lies than tired eyelids on tired eyes.' But higher and ever upward we trace the progress of musical culture by the performances of the sublime oratorios of Handel, Spohr and other great composers, and by the musical services of Westminster, St. Paul's and the other cathedrals and churches of the land. Music could never be thoroughly popular until it was within the reach of all. In meeting this demand, as well as in developing the taste by which the demand is created, the House of Novello occupy the proud position of national benefactors. To promote this ennobling, heaven-born art is a mission worthy of the best of us, and it is not too much to say that one spirit has dominated the many-sided activities of the House in the cause of music, and that one object has been kept steadily in view—the promoting by every means at their disposal the advancement of the musical art and popularising its use. Not only in Great Britain, but in the Colonies, in America, and wherever the English language is spoken and music is practised and cultivated, the publications of our guests of this evening are used and appreciated for their accuracy, cheapness, and fineness of production. To all who are interested—and who are not?—in the history of British industry and British enterprise, and in the elevation of the enjoyment and the culture of the British people by and through the influence of music, the centenary celebration of the establishment of the House of Novello—and the joint achievement of the families of Novello and Littleton—must be an occasion of profound interest and warm congratulation (cheers). I have now, Ladies and Gentlemen, the honour to associate with this toast the name of Mr. Alfred H. Littleton, who, as Master of the Worshipful Company of Musicians, received me a few weeks since an honorary freeman of that ancient guild, and who has in that position, and especially in connection with the recent reception and entertainment of the International Congress of Musicians, and also as the son of his honoured father, whom it was my privilege to know, in the Firm of Novello made all lovers of music, professional and amateur, his debtor. We all wish him and his partners, and their ladies who grace our assembly to-night, health, happiness, and ever-increasing success in their lofty mission of 'freshening life's dusty road with babbling rills of song,' and as the evening of their day approaches may it be their happiness each to discover that:

'The night shall be filled with music,
And the cares which infest the day
Shall fold their tents like the Arabs,
And as silently steal away.'

(Prolonged cheers.)

The toast was drunk with great enthusiasm.

Mr. ALFRED H. LITTLETON, on rising to respond, was most warmly greeted. He said:

'Now, Barabbas was a Publisher . . .'

Sir Vezey Strong, my Lords, Ladies and Gentlemen, you have shown in a very distinct manner that I may count on your sympathy, that I may take it for granted you will join with me in thinking that, when Lord Byron made this eminently libellous—this malicious-sounding statement, if he ever did make it—he did not mean it, it was only his fun. I do not think it is recorded that he quarrelled with his publisher, although we know that he took a great dislike to Scotch reviewers; and this, I think, goes to prove that publishers, at least, are not quarrelsome people. If I may speak of myself, I shall—if I live till next year—have served under the banner of Novello & Co. for half a century, and during all that time I remember no quarrel with a composer; a little difference of opinion occasionally, but it takes two to make a quarrel. On glancing at the life of that greatest of English composers, Handel—although apparently not blessed with the mildest of tempers—there is no sign of serious trouble between him and his publisher. On one occasion he dined at his publisher's house, and was somewhat surprised at the appearance of affluence with which he was surrounded. During dinner he remarked to his host, 'When the time comes round for another oratorio, you shall compose the music, Mr. Walsh, and I will publish it.' This reminds me of another story I heard about the same time, which, though old to me, may I hope prove new to you. There was an eccentric individual who described himself on his visiting card as an importer of wine and a composer of music. I am not sure if he was also a publisher, but a waggish friend suggested that his statement should be modified, and made to read importer of music and composer of wines. I am quite sure that none of this person's compositions are current here to-night—otherwise some of us might find ourselves in the condition of the gallant colonel of whom I heard only yesterday. The colonel was introducing his son to the regimental mess which he had just joined: 'When you stay here unusually late, you must be very careful, my boy; and when you see those two candles over there apparently changing into four candles, say nothing to nobody, but get away home as soon as you can.' 'Come along home, father, there's only one candle over there.' But, my Lords, Ladies, and Gentlemen, you are not here to count innumerable candles; your presence here proves that you do not agree with or endorse Lord Byron's unkind remark; you are not here to support and encourage a band of robbers. You are here, in your great kindness, in recognition of certain work which has been done in the last hundred years. The really valuable part of this work was done by our predecessors, and I have so much veneration for these predecessors that I may be excused for accepting on their behalf everything you so kindly offer. In fact my thanks are due to them much more than are yours; and if you will allow me to say so, I feel that I should stand side by side with you in offering words of gratitude and admiration to those who so effectively prepared the way. These predecessors of ours—Vincent Novello, Alfred Novello, and my father, Henry Littleton—were, in every sense of the word, pioneers. It is difficult to be a pioneer in these days—the ground is covered in every direction—and it is hard enough to keep abreast of the times. Perhaps this is as well, for I tremble to think of what might be the result if we as publishers were to try to be in advance of these present times. It is better to leave this to the advanced guard of the present-day young composer who seems to wish us to believe that all music should be treated as a psychological study—that it should consist of strings of horrible discords, and that there should be a plentiful lack of that concord of sweet sounds we were taught to look for in earlier days. A hundred years ago the case was different, and Vincent Novello, when he began to publish music, searched for forgotten masterpieces and saved them from oblivion for all time. He certainly led an industrious, nay laborious, life. The amount of music he copied with his own hand would fill the shelves of a very large library. Wherever he went—to the Fitzwilliam Museum, to York Minster, or to the libraries of his friends—he was always hunting for and securing treasures. His first publication was issued in May, 1811, and consisted of two volumes of music for the Roman Catholic Church. This contains two or three Masses—settings of the 'Agnus Dei,' 'Ave Verum,' &c., many of them being composed by Novello and his friend, Sam Wesley, and the printing and other expenses were paid for out of his savings as a professional musician. His next large and important undertaking was the issue of no less than eighteen Masses by Mozart, and sixteen by Haydn. Every one of these appeared for the first time in vocal score, and ten by Mozart and nine by Haydn were thus given to the world for the first time in any form. Many of these Masses are to this day only procurable in Novello's edition. He then began to turn his attention to the works of English composers for the English Church, and gave us that magnificent edition of Purcell's services and anthems, for which we cannot be too grateful. This was soon followed by volumes of works by Boyce, Greene, Croft, Kent, Nares, Clarke-Whitfeld, and others. To all of these he added a complete organ accompaniment for the first time, they having appeared previously with a figured bass only. Next came an issue of fourteen of Handel's oratorios and other similar works by Haydn, Beethoven, Cherubini, Weber, Spohr and many others. About this time he also arranged and issued for the use of organists a number of large volumes—the 'Select organ pieces,' the 'Cathedral voluntaries,' and 'Short melodies for the organ.' These three works alone amount to no less than 1,362 pages, thus giving some idea of his prolific industry. In 1829, Alfred Novello, then only nineteen years of age, undertook the duties of a music publisher, helped of course by his father as editor and in many other ways. He began business in a small parlour at 67, Frith Street, Soho, and in 1834 his business was removed to 69, Dean Street, where it remained for many years. The time was not yet ripe for the issue of cheap music as we now know it—but his ambition to take the highest position as a music publisher led him, in 1836, to acquire the copyright of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul.' Its price when first published was 32*s.*, but this was gradually reduced until, twenty years after, the price was 2*s.* only. The Musical Times first appeared in 1844, and the size adopted for this journal was the foundation of Novello's octavo editions. The first oratorio to appear in this size was Handel's 'Messiah,' at the price of 6*s.* 6*d.* This was quickly followed by other great works at similar low rates, which lasted till 1859, when they were practically all reduced to the popular prices of 2*s.* and 1*s.* each. My father became connected with the House of Novello in 1841. Without any previous knowledge of music, he quickly became enthusiastic in his work, and himself described his success in connection with this work as the result of obstinate perseverance. If he thought a work worthy of publication he never counted the cost. He purchased the remainder of the copyright of Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen' for the large sum of £2,000. He paid Gounod the record sum of £4,000 each for 'The Redemption' and 'Mors et Vita,' and, whatever may be thought of 'The Redemption' in these modern times, it was an epoch-making work at that period, especially when one recollects that Gounod was author of the words as well as the music. I can well remember the libretto being described by a distinguished English clergyman as approaching the sublime. During the time that my father was sole proprietor of the business, from 1866 to 1887, he did many notable things. In 1867 he purchased the business of Ewer & Co., thus acquiring the copyright of 'Elijah,' 'Athalie,' 'Hear my prayer,' and many other important works by Mendelssohn. He removed the business to Berners Street, where it remained for forty years, and he ventured large sums of money in concert-giving, and making known works which he had thought worthy of publication. One object of the first series of concerts was to introduce a lower and more reasonable pitch—the diapason normal: please note that this was in 1868. A still more important feature was the revival of Beethoven's Mass in D, and his 'Choral' Symphony, and Bach's Passion music according to St. Matthew. The revival of the Passion music was so successful that the work was given at every musical festival for many years, and at many important concerts all over the country. Soon after the opening of the Royal Albert Hall, Novello & Co. were invited to give oratorio performances there, and the Passion music was again a great feature, being performed on four consecutive evenings in Holy Week in two following years. During the year 1873, and by arrangement with the Exhibition Commissioners, the Firm undertook a series of orchestral concerts, conducted, as were the previous series, by Joseph Barnby, and given every day from April to October—that is, for six months. As a sequence to this, a series of evening concerts was organized by Novello & Co., and concerts were given every night for seven weeks; these included in each week a popular night, a choral night, an oratorio night, a classical night, an English night, and a Wagner night. 'Fancy a Wagner night in 1874!' was the remark of a distinguished musical critic a few days ago. These concerts necessitated the formation of two large choirs, and the permanent engagement of a full orchestra with a military band thrown in occasionally. It may perhaps be claimed that all this work, in addition to that of a few other devoted pioneers, did a great deal to help in forming the taste which has called forth promenade concerts as we now have them, and the number of symphony concerts and symphony orchestras which appear to have become absolute necessities. And now, my Lords, Ladies and Gentlemen, how am I to approach the prose of the present day? I yield to none of you in my admiration of predecessors, but how am I to presume to accept the flattering things said of myself and my fellow workers of the present generation? To reply adequately and to thank our distinguished Chairman for the many too kind things he has said about me, I should have to be as Mrs. Malaprop says 'like Cerberus, three gentlemen at once.' As regards my position in the House of Novello & Co., I can only attempt to show my gratitude by trying to follow in the footsteps of those who so ably led the way; I am very proud of having been able to be of some use in connection with the International Congress, to the success of which our Chairman, Sir Vezey Strong, so kindly and so largely contributed. I also look back with much pride to my year of office as Master of the Worshipful Company of Musicians. I am truly overwhelmed by the kindness you have shown us to-night. I can never thank you sufficiently for the very great honour, the absolutely unique honour and compliment you have thought fit to pay us all to-night. I should like to thank every one of you individually for coming here to-night, but that would take too much of your time; but I must ask permission to thank my friend, Dr. Southgate, who is the person who first conceived the idea, who is the only begetter of this magnificent testimony to and recognition of the humble efforts of Novello & Co. in the cause of music. I thank him most sincerely, most deeply. For this splendid, this gorgeous, address our Chairman has presented to us in all your names, I cannot express my thanks in words; all I can do is to say that my heart is large enough to appreciate and value your extreme goodness, and that it will remain in my memory as long as memory lasts. My children will remember this day, and they will teach their children to remember this day as the most notable and glorious day in all the annals of the House of Novello.

The Alexandra Part Singers here gave an excellent performance of 'Feasting, I watch' (Elgar).

Sir ERNEST CLARKE, in proposing the toast of 'The Music Schools,' said:

The honourable duty has been allotted to me of composing the first of the many variations that are to follow of the theme offered by Sir Vezey Strong for the acceptance of this great gathering. My own qualifications in connection with music are of the negative character indicated by our Chairman, though I lack the poetic insight and charm of oratory of the proposer of the toast of the evening. My task to-night is to invite your attention to the great services that the Firm which we are delighted to honour have rendered to the music schools of this country. As to the value of such services, I think there can be but one opinion. 'The Music Schools' is a comprehensive term, and with the large number of toasts and musical interludes on this evening's programme, time would fail me to mention more than the schools in the Metropolis. The Royal Academy of Music, the earliest in point of date, is this evening most worthily represented by its Principal, and the Royal College of Music by its Director. Both are men most eminent in their profession as teachers and composers. We are holding this centenary celebration within a few yards of what has become the largest school of music in the world, with many hundreds of professional pupils seriously studying the art; and the Guildhall School of Music is represented by its late Principal, our erudite friend Dr. Cummings, as well as by Mr. J. R. Pakeman, the Chairman of the Committee of the City Corporation that controls it. Further we have amongst us Sir Frederick Bridge, who, among his other manifold activities, is Chairman of the Board of the Trinity College of Music. As you will agree with Polonius that tediousness is but outward flourishes and brevity is the soul of wit, and as time is precious, I will only ask you to drink with cordiality the toast of 'The Music Schools.'

Sir ALEXANDER MACKENZIE, Mus. D. (Principal of the Royal Academy of Music), in responding said:

Feasting, I have been watching Sir Ernest Clarke, who has proved how great efficiency may be combined with utmost brevity, and my contribution to the general pæan must also be offered in the shape of a highly concentrated tabloid, instead of the more liberal and generous measure of appreciation which I would dearly have liked to pour forth. That the Music Schools are very deeply indebted to the great Firm of Novello is too obvious a fact to require any elaborate explanation from me. Our best devised educational schemes and endeavours could hardly have been carried out, our progress must naturally and necessarily have been very much slower, if not quite impossible, without those magnificent facilities which have placed the works of the past and present masters in music within easy reach of every student, professor and lover of the art (hear, hear). Our advantages and powers—unfortunately too limited powers—for really effective work, have been immensely increased and aided by that glorious spirit of enterprise which has so materially benefited the cause of musical education in England (hear, hear). But, in addition to all that, I would like to point out the one particular bounty or boon which cannot be bought at any price, be it ever so cheap, and that is the habitual, personal interest and the helpful sympathy which have invariably been shown to the schools of music by the eminent Firm whose members are our guests to-night. Any reasonable request—and I have made not a few in my time, I must confess—has always been most willingly and favourably considered, and as generously met and granted (cheers). I speak of course for the Royal Academy of Music, but perhaps my learned brother, who is to follow me, may be moved to tell you that his experience differs in no way from my own (hear, hear). And here my portion of a very pleasant duty ought to end, but I feel impelled, in spite of the guillotine, or the statute of limitations—(laughter)—to strike just one personal note. It shall be of the shortest and most staccato kind. The presence of a little piece of mine on the programme to-night drives a certain fact very forcibly home to me. The piece in question happens to be either the very first or the second—I forget which—of my most valuable MSS. which I have ever had the privilege of seeing in print above the name of Novello. And you will pardon me for saying so, but it is a source of great gratification and pleasure to me to see that the 'Franklyn's Dogge' is still vigorously leaping over the stile after a period of just upon thirty-five years. Now, I have always considered it a lucky dog, because it was indirectly one of the means of introducing me, a very few years afterwards, to those whose intimacy I rejoice to say I have enjoyed ever since. Mr. Alfred Littleton may correct me if he can when I say—it sounds rather equivocal and ambiguous—that that 'dog's life' synchronises fairly well with the length of our mutual friendship. I am delighted to have this very brief opportunity of acknowledging the very generous assistance I have always received from the first in my public life as a musician, accompanied as it has been by the amicable attachment which I think I may still be permitted to enjoy, after all these years, in the homes of the guests whom we are endeavouring to honour this evening (cheers).

Sir HUBERT PARRY, Bart., C.V.O. (Director of the Royal College of Music), also responded:

He referred to the time-limit for speeches, and said that he would endeavour to give a summary or a synopsis of what he would have said if circumstances had been more favourable. There were two ways of conducting business—one was to go in for quick but temporary returns, the other for slow and continuous ones. The kind of business associated with quick returns was generally supposed to be the purveying of shoddy and flimsy articles; while that associated with slow and continuous returns meant dealing in well-made, genuine things. Now, the crafty ones had a way of making shoddy look like the real thing; and the reason why such craft succeeded was because people as a rule did not trouble to develop sufficient intelligence to be able to distinguish between what was good and what was bad. It was not likely that the big public would be able to distinguish good from bad in music, because it laboured under the peculiar drawback that so many people fancied it was unworthy of serious consideration; hence music offered exceptional opportunities for accumulating enormous profits very quickly by gulling the public. They often heard what huge fortunes were made by people who courted the mob, but the things that were made for the mob were not the things that lasted. The temptation to make rapid profits was great, and many specious arguments were used to justify it. So much the more admirable therefore were the persistency and determination to give the public the things they did not know they wanted until they developed some understanding (hear, hear). The people who devoted themselves to giving the public not shoddy, but the genuine things which would elevate them, do them good, make them happy and enjoy life, stood in the position of disinterested public benefactors (hear, hear). The Firm of Novello had persistently been disinterested public benefactors in this sense for a hundred years (cheers). It was always a joy to see a generous policy rewarded with success and recognition. Recognition they had amply demonstrated that evening by this great assembly; and by the dinner, which, no doubt, those people who proclaimed that good music was not a profitable business would suppose to be the first square meal the Firm had enjoyed for a hundred years (laughter). The courage and persistency with which the Firm had stuck to such honourable objects for all that time could not have attained complete success if they had not been seconded by and also themselves seconded the great educational musical institutions, whose business it was to enable people to understand the difference between shoddy and the real thing. The Firm of Novello had shown their large-mindedness and liberal policy in connection with the Royal College of Music. When that institution was projected the Firm responded with magnificent generosity to the invitation to contribute to the funds necessary for its foundation. They contributed several hundreds of pounds in the lump, and ever since had continued to support the College every year by liberal subscriptions. And they had assuredly done more than that. As Sir Alexander had said, the Firm had helped towards the object so universally desired—the making of education enjoyable—by beautiful books and fine music beautifully printed at most wonderfully cheap prices (cheers). Educational institutions owed an immense debt of gratitude to the Firm, and they were now all pulling together in one comprehensive scheme of what the Germans called 'enveloping tactics,' for they were combined, as it were, in a joyful brotherhood in which the Firm supplied the means of war, and the schools conducted the operations to win the public to the cause of good music. Therefore he could say without hesitation that the principal schools most heartily endorsed this recognition of the work of the Firm of Novello and the compliment to Mr. Alfred Littleton and the rest of them. He hoped their work together would continue for several more centuries until they roused the British public to a sense of the real importance of music in the scheme of things, and perhaps succeeded in placing the English nation in the forefront of the musical nations of the world (loud cheers).

Dr. W. H. CUMMINGS, late Principal of the Guildhall School of Music, proposed the toast, 'The Art of Music Printing in England.' He said:

Thirty-four years ago the great Caxton Exhibition was held, the music exhibits were supervised by a committee of ten, and of that committee there are only two survivors, Mr. Alfred Littleton and myself. To that exhibition Mr. Littleton contributed a copy of the first example of music printing in this country, Higden's Polychronicon, the work of Wynkyn de Worde, issued in 1495. The music in the book was printed not from type but from various pieces of metal utilized for the purpose; Wynkyn de Worde also produced, by double printing, a book of songs which would compare favourably with any foreign production of that time. We then had, in 1550, a beautiful specimen of double printing, lines red and notes black, in Marbeck's Psalter. This, of course, was type; then reference can be made to Dowland's Micrologues of 1609, printed from wood block; shortly after, in 1611, music was printed from copper-plate engraving, which was avowedly made to imitate writing—you are aware that the first printers, Guttenburg and Caxton, also endeavoured, in their books, to produce a resemblance to script. Music from stamped plates was introduced by Walsh about 1710. The first attempt at cheap music was made in 1776 by Fougt, a Finlander, who patented a method of type production that received the approbation of the Society of Arts, which passed a resolution expressing the opinion that it was quite perfect in method and surpassed all previous productions. I may pass over the excellent work done by Clowes and Cooper, and come to the initial publications of Vincent Novello. These were confined to music for the Roman Church, but in 1828 he turned his attention to the anthems and services of Purcell, and it may be well to remember that in his zealous enthusiasm he went to York Minster and copied five anthems by Purcell, which only existed there; shortly afterwards the great fire which consumed the organ and choir stalls destroyed also these originals, and but for the action of Vincent Novello we should now be regretting the irreparable loss of those works of genius. In 1829, Mr. Alfred Novello made a new improvement by issuing octavo editions which ranged in size with the Musical Times, and it is pleasant to remember that the recent issue by the House of Novello of the Purcell Society's publications gives evidence of the highest and best art in the printing of music from stamped plates. What the future of the 'Art of music printing' will be, I am not able to say. Mr. Augustus Littleton, who will respond, is an expert, and possibly he has something to tell you. I can only hope that photography may in some way enable us to have editions of various sizes—folio and octavo—exactly alike, and avoid the necessity of composers having laboriously to correct errors in more than one print. I give you the toast, 'The Art of Music Printing in England,' coupled with the name of Mr. Augustus Littleton.

MR. AUGUSTUS LITTLETON, in responding, said: The committee in kindly inviting me to reply to my dear old friend, Dr. Cummings, suggested that I should discourse to you for a few minutes on the art of modern, essentially modern, music printing. Modern printed music is produced almost entirely by two processes: first, from type, one of the oldest, if not the oldest process of all, and secondly, from engraved, or rather stamped metal plates. Type music printing has been brought to its greatest perfection in England—a perfection to a very large extent due to the exertions of the late Joseph Alfred Novello, who became a music-printer in 1844. These words form the concluding paragraph of a paper which my brother wrote and delivered in connection with the Music Loan Exhibition of the Worshipful Company of Musicians, held at the Fishmongers' Hall some seven years ago. I quote this paragraph because it appears to me to fill the bill, and gives you all the information you require about music printing. I could tell you many things about the way a modern printing office is worked. I could tell you how we fought, and fought successfully, a printers' strike which took place in the early part of this year, but I do not intend to do so. I advised the committee when I accepted the honour of this position in the toast-list that such details would only bore you. Their reply was 'Oh, that will be all right, you speak a minute or two'—note the minute or two—'about modern music printing and then pass to any subject you like.' Sounds easy, does it not? I cannot honestly plead ignorance of the subject. My brother has told you that he has worked under the banner of the House of Novello for close on half a century; he has the advantage of me, it is true, but I have worked under it for forty years, and the greater part of that forty years has been devoted to the supervision of our printing and binding works. I think I know something about most of the publications of the Firm, and I have had a great deal to do with them from the purely mechanical side; but I am not going to enter into those details—wild horses shall not drag them from me, you would only be bored to death. If allowed by the committee I should have selected a subject of which I knew absolutely nothing, and I could then have talked about nothing for a minute or two and all would have been well. Nothing is such an entrancing subject—and one more frequently than not exploited by after-dinner speakers. Shakespeare knew the value of the subject, for did he not say 'Gratiano speaks an infinite deal of nothing,' and in my opinion he spoke it very well. If any of you are really honestly interested in music printing of the present day, and you will come and see me in the purlieus of Soho—we still transact our business in those classic quarters—I will give you practical demonstration of as much modern music printing as you can possibly absorb. If you have patience with me for one minute more, I should like to add my thanks to all those who have been concerned in the function of this evening. It is indeed an honour, unique and unprecedented, and I too must express my deep and sincere thanks for all the kind things which have this evening been said about the House of Novello (loud applause).

The Rev. G. H. PERRY, M.A. (Prebendary of St. Paul's Cathedral), in proposing the toast of 'Music in our Cathedrals and Churches,' said: Looking back a hundred years upon the music in our cathedrals and churches, as far as there was any record of it, they found that things were hardly in a satisfactory condition. In the cathedrals very little printed music was available: people sang from written parts. But memorable and remarkable changes had taken place—changes almost entirely due to the enterprise of the House they were honouring that night. They now had simple anthems for services in the parish churches, and his only complaint against the House was that by publishing the 'Hallelujah Chorus' for three-halfpence, they had encouraged choirs whose capacities were hardly equal to the task of attempting that magnificent composition. Certainly for the cathedrals a great deal had been done, and he referred to the service held in St. Paul's Cathedral on the previous evening, when Sir George Martin's setting of the De Profundis and Spohr's 'Last Judgment' had been sung, and to the annual performance of the Passion Music at St. Paul's. It gave him the greatest pleasure to associate with the toast the name of Sir George Martin.

SIR GEORGE MARTIN, M.V.O., Mus. Doc., responded to the toast:

He said that he could not imagine at that late hour that the gathering desired him to talk much about cathedral music. The subject was a large one, and could not be compressed into five minutes; so, instead of dealing with that, he would like to say a few words about the House of Novello, and all that they had done for cathedral music. In the early days cathedral music was all copied by hand, and, to make a long story short, later there were published large expensive folio volumes, which nobody could afford to buy except the rich. Novello's Firm, however, had given them a small quarto, a neat, beautifully printed copy—a copy that did equally well for treble, alto, tenor and bass, and which an organist could play from. The price was so extraordinarily cheap that the smallest boy in the choir could afford to buy a copy for himself if he wanted it. That was a great achievement. It reminded him of what the penny post did when it first came in, while it also seemed that the House of Novello had done for music and for musicians as much as shorthand had done for commerce. He only wished the head of that House of Novello had been recognised as the inventor of shorthand had been recognised (hear, hear). He concluded by saying he was proud to think that all the heads of that great House were among his most cherished friends (cheers).

DR. HARRY A. HARDING (Honorary Secretary of the Royal College of Organists) submitted the toast of 'Our Choral Societies and Orchestras.'

He remarked that the subject of the toast was one which would command their sympathy as being exceptionally pertinent and applicable to the present occasion. If they looked back over the last hundred years, it would be seen that in some directions less progress had been made than could be desired, but in regard to choral music there had indisputably been a remarkable advance. He thought it was not too much to say that the great mass of music-lovers would never have learned to appreciate the works of the great masters had it not been for the choral Societies. He was glad to think of what his brother organists were doing in that direction. In this respect the organist was the musical salvation of many of our country towns and villages. As a class they were very inadequately paid for their services—for their Church work especially—and yet they gave their time freely to the cultivation of choral music and to the preparation of recruits for our famous choral Societies, which were indeed the envy of the world. They must not forget that the foremost British composers had lately given a great stimulus to choral activities, and he would appeal to these composers, several of whom were present, to pocket their pride and give to lovers of music and members of choral Societies some really easy choral works. Composers did not always get the credit for what they wrote. Dr. Harding told the story of a choirmaster at a Public School who, when conducting Purcell's 'Dido and Æneas,' asked his boys to tell him who composed the work they had been rehearsing for six weeks. Only one boy could give an answer, and he said it was 'Novello' (laughter). He thought they would all agree that the remarkable renascence of choral music was very largely due to the House of Novello, not only because they brought music within the reach of the people, but because of the good offices, influence and encouragement exercised by the personnel of the Firm (cheers). The orchestral Societies had also made wonderful strides, and were doing really splendid work. Here too a great debt was owing to Novello's, for no English firm had published so many full scores as they had.

SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE, C.V.O., Mus. Doc., said:

The fact that he had the honour of conducting the best choral Society—perhaps that was a matter of opinion, but certainly it was the biggest—gave him some title to respond to the toast. He recalled the production by his distinguished predecessor, Sir Joseph Barnby, so closely connected with the Novello House, of the Passion music in the Abbey, and said from this performance it had started on a wonderful new career. He was not present; he had come up from Manchester specially to attend, but the policeman would not let him in. He ought to have said to that policeman: 'Well, you won't let me in now, but the day will come when you will have to let me in' (laughter and cheers). He had sung in the choir at the opening of the Crystal Palace, and there had heard Miss Clara Novello sing the National Anthem. The effect of that voice was wonderful, and when she got to the top B flat, an old man standing by remarked, with fervour, 'That 's a beauty' (laughter). He rejoiced to have the opportunity of thanking the Firm which had done so much for choral music. They owed to Messrs. Novello a great deal, not only for the beauty of their productions, but for the extraordinary correctness of the parts. That remarkable accuracy was entirely due to the readers, for he knew he had often sent up pieces full of mistakes, and these had always been kindly put right. Of course, the head of the Firm was extraordinarily wise and extraordinarily obstinate—(laughter)—he could be disagreeable when he liked, but this was a rare event, and he (the speaker) could say snappy things (renewed laughter). He yielded to no one in his gratitude to the Firm for the way they turned out their work. Every choral Society in England knew the excellence of Novello's catalogue to select from, and there was no firm in this country which could better say, 'See, here, pay your money and take your choice' (cheers).

SIR FREDERIC COWEN, Mus. Doc., also replied, and said:

He was glad to see so many assembled to do honour to the Firm of Novello. With regard to orchestral Societies, he thought he was privileged to speak of them, because he had the honour of conducting, not only in London but throughout the provinces, not a few of these Societies. In the early days of the century under review there was practically nothing but the Philharmonic Society, which next year was to celebrate its Centenary, and which he had had the honour of conducting for some twelve years. In passing, he should say that Novello was one of its first founders. The progress of orchestral music, he thought, dated from the advent of the Crystal Palace Concerts; then came the New Philharmonic and the Richter Concerts; later, the Queen's Hall Orchestra, the London Symphony Orchestra, the New Symphony Orchestra, and others. What was so wonderful was the advance in technique that had taken place in the orchestras. It was related when Manns was conducting Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel' for the first time in this country, he prefaced the performance by turning round to the audience with the remark: 'Ladies and gentlemen, this is the most difficult piece that we have ever had to perform' (laughter). Nobody would think of doing that nowadays; in fact, orchestras found it very difficult to get music which it was impossible to perform (renewed laughter). He thought the day would come before long when modern composers would write music for them that they could not play; they were already tending that way (laughter). Having alluded to the Royal Amateur Orchestra, the Stock Exchange Orchestra, the Strolling Players, the military and public bands, he said that what he would like to see was more permanent orchestras in the provinces, with more decentralisation. He desired to express his own personal recognition and gratitude to the Firm of Novello for what they had done for English music and also, if he might say so, for himself in particular. The Firm had published a good many of his works—whether they sold or not was not the question. In conclusion, he would read a few verses by someone who would remain unknown for the moment—perhaps they were more worthy of Dr. Watts than Tennyson (laughter):

Which is the firm that now can claim
An age so ripe and mellow,
And o'er the world is known to fame? Novello!

No household is complete without
Those books with covers yellow—
Whose enterprise brought this about? Novello!

So let us sing what I may term
A lively ritornello,
Long life to him * and to the firm—Novello!

(The above is a selection of the verses read.)

* Mr. Alfred H. Littleton.

DR. CHAS. D. MACLEAN, M.A. (formerly Precentor of Eton College), submitted the toast of 'The Music in Our Schools.' He observed that it did not deal with the music of drawing-rooms or concert-halls, but with the music in our elementary and so-called secondary schools with their six million or so pupils. The duration of Government protection of school music dated from Sir Robert Peel's Government, which laid the foundations of education in school music, and passed a rather academic resolution to the effect that every teacher in the country must attend the John Hullah classes. This was the foundation stone. Then, later, Mr. Hullah was made inspector of music in training schools. Before Hullah died, a disappointed man, in 1883, he was succeeded in his office by Sir John Stainer, who had Dr. McNaught and the late Dr. W. A. Barrett as assistants. This brought him to the topic of the moment; in these twenty years or more the musical spirit of the age had advanced by rapid strides and had taken possession of the youthful mind of England. Teachers had to look to a firm like Novello's for general guidance; they could not be left to go into an absolutely open market and choose for themselves. Novello's had a vast department of their own in school music, mainly in charge of Dr. McNaught. The Firm had established The School Music Review in 1892, and they had a catalogue of school music which was quite encyclopædic, ranging from Kindergarten songs to the classics. It was not too much to say that for the past twenty years school music had been mainly presided over by Novello's (applause).

DR. EATON FANING (formerly Music-master of Harrow), in acknowledging the toast said he thought it was a most appropriate one for such a gathering, for surely music in our schools had been largely founded by the organization and the publications of the great Firm whose centenary they were celebrating. He did not propose to take them back a hundred years in order to contrast past and present conditions, but no doubt for the past twenty-five years the condition of music in the schools had enormously improved. There was a better touch, better music, better appreciation of good music, and there was less trash in the schools than formerly, while there was a better taste in music springing up everywhere, together with greater facilities for instruction. John Farmer, of Harrow, Paul David, of Uppingham, Bambridge, of Marlborough, and others had upheld the cause of good music at a time when music in the Public Schools was not much thought of. In the Public Schools, again, orchestras had improved wonderfully, and many of them could do without the assistance of a pianoforte. Equally good was the progress made with music in the better type of girls' schools. Their motto should be 'Onward,' and might the Firm of Novello long continue to second the efforts of the schools by giving them the splendid editions of the works which were necessary and which were of such advantage to the schools—and also, he hoped, a source of profit to the publishers (cheers).

Sir HOMEWOOD CRAWFORD (City Solicitor), in submitting the toast of 'Music in our Colonies,' referred to the rapid strides being made with musical education in the Colonies, and to the enthusiasm and pleasure with which our Colonial brethren receive those who go out from the Mother Country. If a cable were to be sent to them that evening asking what House had enabled them to make that advance, the reply would flash back, 'Novello' (cheers). They had with them that evening a worthy Colonial who had come to do honour to the guests that evening, Dr. Charles Harriss, who had done a great deal for that advancement of music. Recently he took the Sheffield Choir round the world, and in other ways had shown the deep interest he feels in British music. Let them not forget those across the seas, and drink very heartily to the success of British music in their Colonies, coupled with the name of Dr. Harriss (cheers).

Dr. CHARLES A. E. HARRISS responded, and expressed his deep appreciation of being associated with the toast of the Colonies. With reference to his having taken 224 British people round the Empire, he assured them that one outstanding feature of that experience was the reception they met with in the United States, particularly in the Western portion. Ten years ago, when he started the Mission which, thank God! had now spread all over the world, he went to the House of Novello and said: 'Sirs, I am embarking upon a scheme which I believe in ten years' time will see me round the world with a big musical project, but to start a huge scheme like that I have little to do it upon. I come to you with a thousand pounds, and I want you to give me £1,500 worth of music for £1,000.' He was delighted to have that opportunity of saying that the House of Novello gave him all and more than he had asked for. The help he had received on that occasion made it possible for him in 1911 to take 224 people round the world at a cost of £60,000, most of which was found through the enthusiasm Overseas in support of a movement for the good of the Empire. Dr. Harding mentioned that organists in England had to conduct choral Societies for very little. Ten years ago in Canada they had few choral Societies, but he knew one that day which paid an organist £1,000 a year to conduct it. For his part, he thought they might well follow the traditions of Great Britain and the example of British institutions, and the conductors of Britain, which were wonderful examples of the progress of music. Those 224 people who followed him round the world were the guests in the homes of leading citizens throughout New Zealand and the whole of United South Africa. What did it spell? Getting together for the flag, and through the medium of music becoming stronger as an Empire. He desired to say how deeply he was indebted to Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Frederick Bridge, Sir Hubert Parry, and other distinguished musicians, and more especially to the House of Novello for what they had been able to do, not only for the benefit of music, but also for the knitting together of the flag (cheers).

Sir WILLIAM E. BIGGE then gave the health of the Chairman, and in the name of that great gathering congratulated Sir Vezey Strong on the well-earned honour that had lately been bestowed upon him. Sir Vezey Strong's name would go down in the golden roll of History as one of the greatest Lord Mayors who had borne sway in the greatest city in the world. They had heard the Chairman's speech that night, and it must have given an enormous amount of intellectual pleasure to them all. He had been privileged to listen to the splendid speech which Sir Vezey Strong made at the banquet at the close of the International Musical Congress, and he could safely say that, in looking over the records of the past, no speech had given him such immense pleasure and admiration as that great speech which their Chairman that evening made on that occasion (cheers). He gave the toast with the utmost pleasure, and asked the company to drink it enthusiastically (applause).

THE CHAIRMAN: I am very much obliged to Sir William Bigge and to you all for having received this toast so kindly, which was proposed in such felicitous terms. I can only say I am very grateful indeed to you, and to those who have organized this interesting and unique function, for allowing me to take the humble part I have in celebrating this wonderful event.

Mr. J. F. R. STAINER formally proposed a hearty vote of thanks to the honorary secretaries, Dr. J. E. Borland, Dr. E. Markham Lee, and Dr. T. Lea Southgate. This was carried with acclamation.

Dr. T. LEA SOUTHGATE thanked the company for the vote of thanks for the work which had been done in getting the gathering together and conducting the correspondence, and said it had been most willingly and readily done. It had been proposed to read a letter written by Mendelssohn from Leipsic in 1837, and addressed to Mr. J. Alfred Novello, but time had not permitted. It would, however, appear in the reports of the proceedings. They had present that evening the grandson of that great composer, who had come to pay his tribute of respect to the Firm of Novello, and in this connection the words his grandfather wrote so long ago were of great interest (cheers).

During the evening the Alexandra Part Singers sang 'A Franklyn's Dogge' (Mackenzie) and 'The Goslings' (J. Frederick Bridge), in addition to the piece named above. No other music, except the Graces and the National Anthem, was performed.

The following acrostic in sonnet form appeared in the programme:

'House of Novello' (1811-1911).

High on the shoulders of Latona's son,
Orbed with untarnished laurels, long ago
Uprose the Pioneer, whose records show
Suffused achievements, enterprise begun.
Exemplar he, through whom our Age has won

Oblations of sweet sounds, which must bestow
Far, and far off, Art's benisons, and throw

New fervent echoes, disallowed of none.
Over the years the Heirs of that great Sire,
Valiant in mood, enlarge his splendid way,
Edging the sphere's with Music's fair array.
Long with the Singing God may they conspire,
Lifting his lyre across the world, till they Obsessed of Song, pass Swan-like, into Day!

Florence Gertrude Attenborough ('Chrystabel').

An Illuminated Address,

Introducing portraits of the three Founders of the House of Novello, viz., Vincent Novello, J. Alfred Novello and Henry Littleton, and of Alfred H. Littleton, the Chairman of the Directors, was presented during the evening.

The address is signed by the Chairman, the President of the committee, and the Honorary Secretaries. The names of the 240 supporters who joined the committee are also added. The following is the text:

We, the undersigned, being deeply interested in the welfare of the Art of Music in this country, desire to place on record our appreciation of the services rendered to that Art by the House of Novello.

Founded in the year 1811 by Vincent Novello, the House, during an entire century, has taken the lead in supplying the English-speaking people with music of every kind, including the works of the great masters, of the foremost British composers, and especially with Church and Choral Music, at prices within reach of the masses. It has thereby, in our opinion, contributed materially to the advancement of musical education, which has during the past hundred years been so marked a feature.

From time to time the House of Novello has also produced works of great importance, which, by fine appearance and typographical excellence, present worthy examples of the printer's art.

The Firm has, further, been closely associated with many practical Musical undertakings, aiding with both counsel and financial support.

This Centenary year of the Firm has been made memorable by the fact that Mr. Alfred H. Littleton has held the Office of Master of the Ancient City Guild, 'The Worshipful Company of Musicians,' and by the Firm's valuable services in the furtherance of the International Musical Society's Congress; and in the publication of the Music for the Coronation of their Majesties King George and Queen Mary.

We desire to congratulate the House of Novello on its past record, and to offer our sincere wishes for its abundant prosperity in the future.

A series of lectures is now in progress at the Athenæum, Muswell Hill, under the auspices of the Muswell Hill Musical Union. 'Sonata form' was the subject of the inaugural lecture by Mr. C. Egerton Lowe on November 10; the second, 'How to sing,' was given by Mr. Montague Borwell on December 16. Mr. Julius Harrison has arranged to speak on Debussy on January 20.

Church and Organ Music.

The Position of the Church Organist.

We have read with much interest, in the Monthly Report of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, a series of most ably written articles dealing with this question. The matter is treated exhaustively, and the melancholy conclusion arrived at is that the organist has no legal status, and that he is subject to the caprice of any new vicar or incumbent who may chance to be inducted to the living. Examples are given of cases in which the organist has invoked the aid of the law, and in each the vicar triumphs. The opinion of no less an authority than Sir Robert Phillimore only strengthens the vicar's case. To mention one particular instance, the parish church of Yeovil retained the services of one organist for a period of nearly forty years. At the end of that time the vicar, presumably a new one, instituted drastic changes, even to the extent of forbidding the organist to play voluntaries. A criminal suit brought by the vicar against the organist on his resenting these changes only resulted in the latter being condemned, with an admonition, in costs. It is of course impossible to fight against such obstacles as undoubtedly exist, unless some drastic change in ecclesiastical law be secured. The organists of the Free Churches are far more justly treated, for, as the article quotes, 'In the multitude of counsellors there is safety,' and the appointment of an organist by a committee is more likely to lead to a satisfactory understanding. We have always found it difficult to appreciate the justice of the fact that though an organist may be dismissed on the shallowest pretext by an incumbent, the latter should hold his appointment for life, except for a misdemeanour. Even then, the matter would obtain a deliberate inquiry. The organist has no such opportunity. That a change must come there can be little doubt, but there is still less doubt that the organist should strive to improve his exterior position in as many ways as possible. The study of another instrument, possibly the violin, or the cultivation of composition, would not only widen his horizon, but would probably render him less dependent upon his church appointment.

It is often urged that the organist's position gives him an advantage as a teacher in his district, but we feel sure that the really good all-round man would hold his own apart from that. There are no doubt some solid reasons for holding the office, as in the case of illness, but the often meagre stipend and the insecurity of the post go far to diminish such advantages. We said some time ago in these columns that the organist should in all ways strive to win the esteem and confidence of those under whom he works. We still urge that advice, and it is certain that tact will often do more than anything else to clear the way for those friendly relations we all desire.

If the number of young men who insist on becoming organists increases at the present rate, there may come a time when some united action will succeed in giving the organist at least a chance of speaking in his own defence, and of being impartially judged. Would not the good offices of such a body as the Royal College of Organists carry weight in such a worthy cause?

A new organ has recently been built by Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper, of the Cathedral Organ Works, Liverpool, and erected by them in the Parish Church, Bromborough, Cheshire. It consists of three manuals and a Pedal organ, and each is well designed in its tonal scheme. The action of the manuals, pedals, and the octave-couplers is pneumatic.

A new organ has been built by Messrs. J. W. Walker & Sons for Khartoum Cathedral and, though small, presents features of some interest. The instrument is very specially constructed to withstand the extreme climate, mahogany being extensively used for the wood-work, all joints being dry. Reed stops have been purposely omitted from the specification on account of sand storms, and throughout the construction has been of as simple a design as possible. The blowing is by hydraulic power, the engine being by Messrs. Watkins & Watson, of Islington. An opportunity of hearing the instrument was afforded on November 20, when Mr. R. Goss Custard gave an interesting recital, well displaying the capabilities of Messrs. Walker's work. The following is the specification:—

GREAT ORGAN—(CC to A, 58 Notes).

1	Open Diapason	8 feet	58 pipes

We have received an 'explanatory preface' and some specimen pages of a new Pointed Psalter which is shortly to be published by the Rev. Walter Marshall and Mr. Seymour Pile, the vicar and organist respectively of St. Patrick's, Hove. We await the appearance of the book with great interest, and should welcome any scheme which makes for the simplification of this important part of the church service. Hitherto, we think that similar efforts have too often resulted in exchanging one difficulty for another, but from a perusal of the pages sent us there seems to be a decided gain in simplicity. We cannot quite follow the editors in their desire to encourage the congregational singing of the Psalms. We know well the heinous nature of our offence, and that we shall bring down on our offending selves the wrath of every one who thinks it possible to turn a large number of persons, too often of very doubtful musical perception, into a trained choir. But it is useless to debate the point, and we can only add that if the forthcoming volume lightens, as we believe it will, the task of choir-masters, its appearance will be welcomed. A great point in its favour is that existing chants may still be used.

SPECIAL SERVICES.

Choir festival services were held at the Halifax Place Chapel, Nottingham, on November 19, the anthems being 'God so loved the world' (Moore) and 'Sing unto God' (Handel). In the afternoon, Sterndale Bennett's 'Woman of Samaria' was given. Mr. E. M. Barber conducted, and Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson accompanied at the organ.

On Sunday, December 10, an excellent performance of Spohr's 'Last Judgment' was given at St. Mary Abbot's, Kensington, by the choir of the church. The soloists were Master Eric Bates, and Messrs. Jefferies, Acton, Ginger, Pearce, Toy, Lewis, and Burgess. Mr. Henry R. Bird was at the organ, and Mr. W. G. Ross conducted.

A special Advent musical service was held in the parish church, Shifnal, Shropshire, on Wednesday, December 13, when the Oratorio Choir sang 'Praise His awful Name' (Spohr's 'Last Judgment'); 'How lovely is Thy dwelling-place' (Brahms's 'Requiem'); and 'I praise Thee, O Lord' (Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul'). The performance was under the direction of Mr. W. Brennand Smith, organist of the church, who also played Mendelssohn's Sonata in C minor.

The cantata, 'Everyman,' by Cuthbert Nunn, was performed at St. Bede's Church, Liverpool, on December 13, under the direction of the organist, Mr. Ernest H. Smith.

ORGAN RECITALS.

Mr. Albert Orton, Walton Parish Church, Liverpool—Second sonata, Mendelssohn.

THE NEWLY-FOUND BEETHOVEN SYMPHONY.

By Charles Maclean.

Francis Bacon (wrongly called Lord Bacon, by the profanum vulgus) wrote: 'If a man will begin with certainties, he shall end in doubt; but if he will be content to begin with doubts, he shall end in certainties.' Within the last five months Berlin began with much certainty about a newly-found Beethoven love-letter, and Jena soon demonstrated that both publisher-editor and music-critic in that case had been hoaxed by a modern forgery (see Musical Times of November, 1911, page 714). Jena itself, on the other hand, has for some years past had its own discovery, in the form of an early Symphony by Beethoven, preceding the 'Nine,' and illustrating in an important manner the development of his genius; has exposed this matter to all manner of searching investigations; and has finally, about a month back, given the Symphony for publication with a complete confidence that it is genuine. With this juxtaposition of events, the public may incline to be shy. 'Brent child of fire hath much drede.' As far as can be done in a short note the present remarks will state what has happened about the Symphony, and set out the evidence for its authenticity.

Fritz Stein, born 1879 at Heidelberg, is now thirty-three years old. Beginning life as a theological student, he took to music when twenty-three, as assistant to Philipp Wolfrum (1854—), the Heidelberg organist-composer, whose 'Weihnachts-mysterium' was performed in English at Hereford Festival in September, 1903 (see Musical Times, October, 1903, page 671). In 1906 Stein secured an independent appointment, succeeding Karl Ernst Naumann (1832-1910), who retired, as University music-director, town-organist, and local conductor, at Jena. Here he showed activity and ability. An 'Academy Concert Society,' a sort of musical club attached to the University, founded 1769, still flourishes at Jena. In the Society's music-cupboard Stein came across a set of symphony orchestra-parts, purporting (see later) to be by Beethoven. He carried this subject about with him for years, seeking a score (which has not been found), and making historical researches. He compiled a score from the parts. He submitted the facts to various experts. At the London Congress of May, 1911, he read a paper and played the Symphony on the pianoforte. In the International Musical Society's Quarterly Magazine for October, 1911, he published a detailed article setting out all his grounds, and affirming his conviction that the Symphony was Beethoven's. This last year Messrs. Breitkopf & Härtel, of Leipsic, have acquired all the publicational rights, and have now published the Symphony in score and parts, in miniature score, in pianoforte-solo arrangement, and in pianoforte-duet arrangement. The first of these last two is by Otto Singer, of Leipsic, and the second is by no less a person than the redoubtable Max Reger, of Leipsic.

The evidence for authenticity is in brief as follows: (a) Beethoven (1770-1827) was in Bonn till 1792, and then moved to Vienna. Experts say that the parts are of the close of the 18th century, and that they are probably by a non-Jena copyist, and so 'imported' into Jena. In the bulk of the parts there is an absence of any composer's name, which is not unnatural if a score accompanied them. But on the second violin part is written 'Par Louis van Beethoven,' and on the violoncello part 'Symphonie von Bethoven' (the old pronunciation, i.e., Bethoven). These names are entered in by the same copyist who wrote the parts, and at the same time. Now, our Beethoven was an almost unknown person at that date, and it could not have been worth any person's while to make a fraudulent contemporaneous entry. The idea of mistaken entry on the part of a copyist taking parts out of a score is, almost for the same reason, essentially improbable. This about the entry on the two parts is the primary evidence; the rest is corroborative. (b) Correspondence is found between one Bartholomäus Ludwig Fischenich in Bonn and Schiller's wife, then living at Jena, showing that Fischenich specifically sent for her inspection works of large dimension of the then youthful Beethoven, just about the time when the latter was moving from Bonn to Vienna. 'Grove,' by-the-bye, strangely calls this lady Schiller's sister. (c) Young Christoph von Breuning, eldest son of the Bonn widow, whose house was a second home to Beethoven, matriculated at Jena on November 11, 1793, and nothing is more probable than that he helped to introduce to the University club concerts the work of his friend, who was just about his own age. (d) Beethoven's 'First Symphony,' Op. 21, came out in Vienna on April 2, 1800, when he was thirty years old, and was almost his first publicly-produced orchestral work. Considering his well-known habits of preliminary exercise and study, it is almost incredible that he actually wrote no Symphony before that, and the discovery fills in this sense a historical gap. (e) A perusal of the score will show the most cursory observer that, if the work is founded on Haydn's general style, especially on Nos. 5 and 7 of the 'London' symphonies, it is also replete with idioms which occur in Beethoven's acknowledged later works. (f) On the principle of elimination one might ask, if this work is not Beethoven's, What other composer was there of the end of the 18th century who could have written it?

FRAU 'LILY' WACH.

MENDELSSOHN'S YOUNGEST DAUGHTER.

Many of our readers will be interested to learn some particulars regarding Frau Geheimrath 'Lily' Wach, the last surviving child of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, who was born at Liepsic on September 19, 1845. After her father's death she lived first in Berlin with her mother, and after the death of the latter with her grandmother, Mrs. Jeanrenaud, née Souchey, at Frankfort-on-Main. There she was educated at home as a member of the French Protestant congregation, under the care of the pastor, M. Bonnet, by whom she was both confirmed and married, and who also baptised her eldest son. Like her father she was much attached to England, where, besides a married sister—the late Mrs. C. Victor Benecke—she had many friends. Her first visit to this country was in 1862, and she was here frequently. She spoke English with no less facility than French, and was intimately acquainted with the literature of both countries. On March 23, 1870, she married Professor Adolph Wach, then at Rostock, later at Tubingen, Bonn, and Leipsic.

In music her taste was classical with naturally a particular interest in, and love for, the works of her father. She had a large circle of musical friends, including the late Dr. Joseph Joachim, Mr. and Mrs. H. von Herzogenberg, and many others. At Leipsic, where Prof. Wach is a Director of the Gewandhaus Concert Society, their home was for years the scene of many musical gatherings.

Mr. Oliver E. Fleet Cobb, with whose family the late Frau Wach was on intimate terms, sends us some interesting extracts from her recent correspondence.

On January 20, 1909, writing with reference to a photograph of her father's grave, she says:

I am sending off to-day the photo—it has been taken on purpose for you last week and shows the white cross of Silesian marble with my father's name, as it is now. I think you will be able to read the names and date quite easily—Next the cross, on the left hand, is the small monument of a child's grave of eight years; my little brother Felix, who died of scarlatina in 1851 is buried there. To the right is Fanny Hensel's tombstone, née Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, died May 14, 1847. . . . . My mother's grave is in Frankfort-on-Main, where she died of consumption, September 25, 1853, at her mother's house.

On April 15, 1909, writing from Leipsic, she says:

I want to thank you very warmly for the lovely surprise you so kindly thought of giving me on Easter Sunday morning. It really seemed a wonder how the blooming roses, lilies and violets could have come from Sidcup, Kent, to the Goethestrasse in Leipsic, and without losing their freshness and sweet scent!!! But what pleased me even more than this miracle and mysteriously quick communication, was to feel that I had to thank my father's memory for this tribute of kindly feeling. I hope the photograph of my old face has arrived just in time to thank you for remembering me and am with kind regards to Mrs. Fleet Cobb.

Yours very sincerely, LILI WACH.

Mr. Fleet Cobb informs us that Frau Wach's last visit to England was in October, 1897, when she came over to attend the funeral of her sister, Mrs. C. V. Benecke, at Barnet.

From 1880 until her death in her sixty-sixth year, on October 15, 1910, Professor and Mrs. Adolph Wach regularly spent the summer months at 'Ried,' their châlet at Wilderswil, near Interlaken; and here she died, leaving three sons and three daughters, and was buried at Gsteig, Interlaken, on October 18, 1910.

In a letter Mr. Fleet Cobb had at the time, Mr. Felix Moscheles (Mendelssohn's godson) says, 'I shall always remember her as a lovely, ideally beautiful girl and charming woman.'

Dr. A. Mendelssohn Bartholdy, her son-in-law, writing to Mr. Fleet Cobb on November 16, 1910, says: 'In fact, her mind was in the last months almost exclusively occupied by thoughts of her English friends . . . and of the old ties between your country and her family.'

M. CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS'S 'DÉJANIRE.'

By M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

M. Saint-Saëns's opera, 'Déjanire,' performed at the Théâtre de l'Opéra, is, according to the composer's express assertions, to be his last. The French master, now over seventy-six years of age, whose career has been an unusually long and active one, is well entitled to rest. But he shows, in mind and body, so marvellous a briskness (one remembers that not long ago he went to Heidelberg for the Liszt centenary, and took part in the celebration concerts as a pianist) that it is yet possible he may change his mind, if only for combativeness' sake.

M. Saint-Saëns, an optimist and, in his own way, a humorist, remarked not long ago that some people called him the greatest of living composers, and others anathematized him as a dull old fogey—thus establishing a balance. Being satisfied that the modern tendencies of musical art are depraved and deplorable, he may yet be tempted to assert the rights of the forms he believes in, never caring whether he is sneered at by juniors. Sneers cannot touch him in the least; he has a firm conviction that in the hands of the younger generation music is running astray. He shows as much, not only by strictly adhering, as a composer, to non-modern methods, but by the tone of almost all the essays or articles that he writes. Be they on the most general subjects, like the question of prose versus poetry in opera-books, or on tonality, or on the ballet, they all include, like a delenda Carthago, some satire against modern tendencies.

This, coming from M. Saint-Saëns, was at first rather unexpected; for the now ultra-conservative composer has in his time been hailed—and deservedly—as the leader of the progressive party in music. He is one of the founders of the French school of symphonists and writers of chamber-music. A sturdy champion of Liszt's innovations, he has ever proclaimed their import as examples which he himself has striven to follow. In 1871, he helped to create the Société Nationale de Musique, whose concerts for forty years have so well forwarded the cause of the French school. But now M. Saint-Saëns, who had halted almost as soon as the current of which he was one of the generators had begun to spread, has raised the cry of alarm, and wages lustily, if strategically, war against 'Franckism' and impressionism alike. 'Déjanire' is to be understood as exemplifying both his creed and his strategy; he has written it not only as a work after his own heart, but as a set-off against all that he blames. In fact, there is no other explanation for it. 'Déjanire' is a deliberate attempt to write in Gluck's style—except, of course, that the orchestral treatment is modern—but with a difference: as it is, one cannot overlook the fact that Gluck, from beginning to end, proved a revolutionary, as have been all the musicians that are to-day's classics. Sainte-Beuve said that 'in art truly created expression alone counts.' If this severe but legitimate standard be applied, it is to be feared that 'Déjanire' will not be appraised any higher than 'L'Ancêtre,' 'Les Barbares' or, in short, the greater part of what the composer has written of late. On the other hand, admirers of M. Saint-Saëns will find reason enough to enjoy once again the elegance of his writing and the technical skill that has made him famous.

The Opéra has done its best to ensure 'Déjanire's' success, which however is but moderate. The excellent artists Mlle. F. Litvinne and M. Muratore impersonate Déjanira and Hercules, supported by Mlles. Gall and Charny and M. Dangés.

LONDON OPERA HOUSE.

By HERMANN KLEIN.

So far, Mr. Oscar Hammerstein has done a great deal better than was expected. Indeed, he has done so well during the opening month of his season that, if he can keep up the pace, he will quickly falsify the predictions of all the Zadkiels and Old Moores of the operatic world. The fact that these were for the most part extremely pessimistic only served (as I hinted would be the case in the last number of the Musical Times) to spur the American impresario on to higher deeds of emulation. He may be disappointed that he cannot flaunt in our faces a list of subscribers comparable with that of Covent Garden in the regular season, which no one but himself could have ever been sanguine enough to imagine possible; yet assuredly he is secretly elated when, night after night, opera-lovers besiege the doors of his new theatre in crowds and betray a very genuine interest in, as well as unmistakable approval of, the kind of performances that he is offering. 'Quo Vadis' has to a certain extent 'caught on'; while if 'William Tell' and 'Norma' have not repaid the expense of revival, 'Rigoletto' and 'Faust' unquestionably have done so—the former owing chiefly to one of those happy trouvailles which occasionally reward the operatic manager even as a large nugget rewards the prospector for gold in a 'claim' that has not been exhausted.

The 'find' in question was Miss Felice Lyne, a youthful soprano from Kansas, U.S.A., who made her débût in grand opera as Gilda on November 25, and awoke next day to find herself famous. I did not hear Miss Lyne until her second appearance in the same character, but was then much struck by the charm and power of her organ, the spontaneity and grace of her singing, the general girlish sincerity and dramatic appropriateness of her impersonation. To call her as yet a star of the very highest magnitude would be to say too much. On the other hand it would be equally unwise to place a limitation upon the possibilities of a young artist whose natural gifts are so remarkable, whose musicianly intelligence is so exceptional, whose voice possesses a timbre of such haunting beauty, such unusual compass and strength, as are manifest in the case of Miss Lyne. Unless many good judges are greatly mistaken, this American débutante will go far. Meanwhile her delightful embodiment of Gilda, supported by the robust Duca of Mr. Orville Harrold and the histrionically superb Jester of M. Maurice Renaud, has been imparting to the 'Rigoletto' performance elements of attraction to which admirers of old-fashioned opera and brilliant vocalization have been only too glad to respond.

The 'Faust' revival was chiefly noticeable for a brightness and verve in the choral scenes that do not often distinguish the performances of Gounod's opera to which we are accustomed. It is good to see the incidents of the Kermesse acted as well as sung with the right spirit, while a chorus that can take an intelligent interest in the manner of Valentin's death is the exception rather than the rule. Obviously Mr. Hammerstein had taken more pains over these things than his setting of Marguerite's garden. The fair Gretchen herself had at the outset a pleasing and capable exponent in Mlle. Vallandri; later in the month the part was undertaken by Mlle. Isabeau Catalan. So, again, the rôle of Faust has been shared by Mr. Orville Harrold and Signor Ansaldi, and that of Mephistopheles by M. Francis Combe and M. Henry Weldon; while M. José Danse has further deepened, as Valentin, the excellent impression he made as William Tell.

The choice of 'Lucia di Lammermoor' for Miss Felice Lyne's 'second débût,' as the French call it, was doubtless governed by managerial considerations rather than an overwhelming desire on the part of the public to hear Donizetti's well-worn opera in a new setting. I suppose it is inevitable that a fresh and youthful 'star' shall give evidence of her vocal genius in a number of hackneyed rôles before appearing in the parts that interest us, and for which we need her most. In course of this round it is to be hoped that Mr. Hammerstein will afford Miss Lyne the chance of singing Juliette. Petite and pretty, as well as full of temperament, she will look the Italian heroine as have few opera singers since Patti; and the music should suit her to perfection. Meanwhile her Lucia may be characterized as a very remarkable achievement for one so inexperienced in the art of the stage. Not merely by her singing, which was replete with dramatic sentiment even when indisposition interfered with her intonation, but by some singularly original touches in her treatment of the Mad Scene, Miss Lyne proved herself an artist of quite unusual calibre. The richness of her tone in the medium register and the ease and spontaneity with which she produces it are not less surprising than the beauty and power of her head-notes. In fact, here would seem to be the successor to Melba and Tetrazzini for whom the world is looking. Not since the days of Fancelli and Ravell has a tenor been heard in London so lavish, so unsparing of his high C's and C sharps as Mr. Orville Harrold. He made altogether a splendid Edgardo, and his acting was not perhaps more conventional than such a conventional part compelled. But as a rule he would do well to leave a little more strength in reserve for the broad melody and soaring phrases of the final 'Tu che a Dio,' which is in more senses than one the true climax of an Edgardo's career.

After licensing Strauss's 'Salome,' the Censor could no longer consistently withhold permission for the performance of Massenet's 'Hérodiade,' in something like its original shape. On December 14, Mr. Hammerstein took full advantage of the opportunity. He could not conceal the weaknesses, the lack of inspiration and dramatic grip that are inherent in Massenet's early score; but he has made one inclined to pass these over for the sake of many moments of melodic charm and a wealth of spectacular grandeur that far exceeds in richness and beauty any display witnessed in an opera house in this country since the days of Augustus Harris. The Temple and the processional scenes are magnificently done, and, if the details of Jewish ritual are purely imaginative, they are at any rate impressive, which is saying a great deal. Indeed, those who remember the Paris production of thirty years ago, and also saw the emasculated version put on at Covent Garden in 1904, will not hesitate to say that the new impresario has beaten both.

The characters of this opera may be Biblical in name, but there the identity practically ends. After all it is only the presence and the delineation of John the Baptist that really matter; and inasmuch as he is merely described in the bill as 'A Prophet,' and comports himself as a very ordinary human one at that, we are quite content not to associate him with the noble, towering figure recorded in the Gospels. In his operatic aspect he is capitally represented by M. Jean Auber, a highly efficient French tenor, whose voice came out exceedingly well in the prison duet with Salome. The latter had a lithe and graceful exponent in Mlle. Lina Cavalieri, who sang and acted with animation, albeit necessarily a colourless personage after the perverse, passionate creature of Strauss's opera. The part of Hérodiade introduced a new and intensely dramatic mezzo-soprano in Mlle. Marguerite d'Alvarez, an artist of Peruvian birth and Belgian training. She proved to be an admirable actress, and the possessor of a rich, warm, powerful organ, which she uses with skill and genuine dramatic instinct. Mlle. d'Alvarez had an extremely cordial reception. M. Maurice Renaud furnished an artistic presentment of Hérode, singing 'Vision fugitive' splendidly; and M. Henry Weldon made a competent Phanuel. The generally smooth presentation of the opera, under the guidance of Signor Luigi Cherubini, and the masterly stage-management of M. Jacques Coini, must not pass without mention.

Annals of the Irish Harpers. By Charlotte Milligan Fox. With illustrations.

[Smith, Elder & Co.]

All interested in the study of the Irish Harp will give a cordial welcome to the above work by Mrs. Milligan Fox, the energetic hon. secretary of the Irish Folk-Song Society. The 'Annals of the Irish Harpers' can claim a place in music libraries, and is mainly a narrative of Arthur O'Neil and Edward Bunting, with a fund of anecdotes respecting O'Carolan, Dingenan, Byrne, Keenan, Lyons, Heffernan, Hempson, Connellan, O'Cahan, Morgan, Duncan and other eminent harpers of the 18th century. The life work of Edward Bunting has been obscured by the labours of Petrie and Holden, but his chief merit rests in the publication of his three collections in 1796, 1809 and 1840 respectively. Unfortunately his acquaintance with early printed collections of Irish music was limited, and his guesses at the age of certain songs excited unfriendly comment. For all that, his work in taking down and collecting ancient harp melodies has not been sufficiently appreciated, and it so happened that his second volume synchronized with the appearance of the first two numbers of Moore's Melodies.

Mrs. Fox has done her part of the editing of the Bunting and O'Neill manuscripts in an admirable fashion, and she has supplied numerous illuminating notes. However, many cryptic references might have been explained, and some of O'Neill's slips might have been corrected. Also the proof-reading has not been sufficiently attended to, and the spelling of Irish words is haphazard. 'Terence Mungan,' alluded to by O'Neill as having become Bishop of Limerick, was Charles Morgan, who changed his name (as well as his religion) to Warburton, and was appointed Bishop of Limerick on July 7, 1806, but he was promoted to Cloyne in 1820. Thomas Lewis O'Beirne, 'priest O'Beirne,' who also 'verted, was not chaplain to Lord Fitzwilliam, but to Lord Portland, in 1782. However, he did become chaplain to Lord Fitzwilliam in 1795, and was made Bishop of Ossory in the same year, being translated to Meath in 1798. A strange slip is making Dean Delaney, in 1743, become the husband of 'Mrs. Mary Delaney, a widow of literary and social distinction.' Of course, this should be 'Mrs. Mary Pendarves,' the widow of a man whose first wife was the celebrated Lady Dorothy Burke, who spoke the epilogue of 'Dido and Æneas' in 1689. There are six portraits, and the work is produced in excellent style by Smith, Elder & Co. It is dedicated to the Rt. Hon. The Earl of Shaftesbury, K.P., K.C.V.O., President of the Irish Folk-Song Society.

ORGAN MUSIC.

First Sonatina for the Organ. In A minor. By Sigfrid Karg-Elert.

Vorspiel und Liebestod ('Tristan und Isolde'). Arranged for the organ by John E. West.

Sursum Corda and Alla Marcia for the Organ. By John Ireland.

Morceau de Concert, for the Organ. By Alfred Hollins.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

To the many notable contributions of Mr. Karg-Elert to the organist's répertoire, there must now be added another remarkable work. It consists of two movements only, viz., Allegro moderato, and Andante molto (tempo di Ciacona). Though the themes of the first movement are not without beauty, the somewhat restless tonality is hardly compensated for by their development. We feel sure that the fame which undoubtedly awaits the Sonatina will be due to the second movement. The character of the Chaconne is admirably sustained. Commencing in A minor, the theme is treated in great variety of manner, this first section leading to the statement of the second (Tripelfughetta). Scope for a neat technique and careful phrasing is here found in plenty. The pedals are silent for several pages, only to enter later with splendid effect. The peroration of the movement should produce a truly magnificent display, the chord arrangement being of the most sonorous character. A rapid manual passage leads again to the concluding section in A major. The whole movement will serve to show the various tonal resources of a modern organ, while the technical necessities are perhaps not beyond the organist of average attainments.

Any organ arrangement of the famous Vorspiel and Liebestod from Wagner's 'Tristan und Isolde' must make extensive demands upon the skill of the player and the resources of the instrument. Mr. West has so far succeeded in gaining his effects by legitimate means, and the version should be acceptable enough. It is hardly the sort of music, fine as it is, which should be played in a church, its proper place being on a concert organ, and there is no reason why it should not make a great effect when under skilful hands.

Mr. Ireland's excellent and original pieces may be recommended as requiring an organ of moderate size, and they would serve well as voluntaries before and after service respectively. Their dedication to Sir Walter Parratt is an additional interest.

Mr. Hollins's 'Morceau' is in his best style, with its telling rhythm, graceful melody, and effective registration. A certain charm of harmonic progression is apparent in all he writes, and the piece is singularly happy in this respect.

The lost Iphigenia. A novel by Agnes and Egerton Castle.

[Smith, Elder & Co.]

The musical interest is foremost in this story. The authors have made a bold cast into the future, and have conceived Dr. Lothnar, a second and greater Wagner, with Frankheim as a second and greater Bayreuth. Straussian influence is suggested in the Master's choice of 'Prometheus,' 'Iphigenia' and 'Phèdre' as three of his principal works. The authors withhold, however, their prophetic insight into the nature of the super-music of the future. They wisely eschew technicalities and almost disappoint us by not committing a single solecism. They might at least have told us the fate of the whole-tone scale.

The Eternal God is thy refuge. Anthem by John E. West.

[The H. W. Gray Co.]

Mr. West's Church music is invariably distinguished by high musicianship, excellent and effective vocal writing, and an interesting independent organ part. This anthem is certainly no exception, and as it lies within the scope of most choirs of any experience, it will no doubt attract attention. It admirably suits the spirit of a Church Festival or other important service, or would serve for general use.

SONGS.

Galloping Dick. Some perfect rose. By Percy E. Fletcher.
Fairy voices. By Ernest Newton.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

It is some time since so good a song of the 'rollicking' class as Mr. Fletcher's 'Galloping Dick' has been put forth, Mr. Rothery's verses are admirably turned, and have a lilt of their own which the composer's swinging six-eight time heightens irresistibly. The refrain that occurs after each verse is an obvious invitation to all and sundry to 'join in.' The sentiments expressed are those common to all vocal highwaymen, and of course bold, bad Dick is a baritone or bass.

Considering the otherwise blameless character of Mr. Fletcher's pleasant, melodious song 'Some perfect rose,' the key-system is somewhat surprising. The words give the clue to the composer's intention. Their growing ecstasy is represented by a verse in G major, a verse of modulation, and finally a third verse in the full radiance of A flat, in which key the song closes.

Mr. Ernest Newton's 'Fairy voices' is well-timed, and doubtless many a star-tipped wand will wave to its innocent strains before the pantomime season is over. It has a pretty tune, which has been adapted to the needs of both soprano and contralto fairies.

BEETHOVEN'S CHORAL SYMPHONY.

THE METRONOME RATE OF THE TRIO.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—The interesting letters of Sir Charles Stanford on Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which appeared in The Times of October 30 and November 1, have only lately come to my notice.

We must accept Sir Charles Stanford's account of what Beethoven actually wrote with regard to the speed of the Scherzo and Trio, viz., that the dotted minim of the Scherzo is to be equal to the undotted minim of the Trio, both being = 116; but it would appear that the conclusion of the matter is by no means certain. There are considerations which it is impossible to place on one side, and which point to the likelihood of a 'primitive error.'

Your 'Occasional Note' in the December issue of the Musical Times alluded to these considerations, which are, shortly: (1) the Stringendo of eight bars, leading up to the Trio from the Scherzo; (2) The change of description as between the two sections—the Scherzo being marked Molto vivace, the Trio, Presto.

1. The writer of 'Occasional Note' suggests that the presence of the Stringendo need not trouble us, that it does not necessarily lead up to a faster beat at the Trio: 'It was Beethoven's delightful way to lead to the unexpected.' Yes! but does it not rather lead to the 'expected'; and is not the 'expected' plainly indicated by the change to Presto? Surely the Stringendo can scarcely mean less than that Beethoven did intend the Trio to go faster than the Scherzo!

2. If Beethoven really intended the Presto to go at the same pace as the Molto vivace, why did he make use of the two terms? Why, if he wanted to make sure, did he not simply say Tempo primo, or L'istesso tempo?

And when (1) and (2) are taken together, as they are together in the work, a strong doubt is thrown on the interpretation of the metronome mark, which we may admit Beethoven did actually write into his MS. at Berlin.

Dr. McNaught, in his letter, quoted from the Westminster Gazette, says that he has never heard any conductor take the Trio at double the rate indicated in Beethoven's MS. I hope not, indeed! For myself—and, I believe, for many others—I dare to say that I have not any confidence either in the mark 𝅗𝅥 = 116 which the publishers, as a rule, have adopted, or in the ♩ = 116, which Beethoven seems to have written. Both are plainly wrong, the one too fast, the other too slow; and the two considerations dealt with above must be allowed due weight in settling what should be a just view of Beethoven's real meaning.

Sir Charles Stanford's first letter appears to say that Beethoven's metronome marks are to be found in the original edition. In passing, though it matters little, it may be stated that the copy of the original edition, published by Schott in 1826, which is in the Cambridge University Library, and the plates of which are numbered 2322, has no metronome marks at all! Sir Charles, no doubt, refers to a later 'state' of this original edition.

In connection with this interesting difficulty, or error, whichever it is, your readers may be glad to hear of a positive blunder which appears in every pianoforte arrangement of the Ninth Symphony which I have seen in print. In the tenth bar from the end of the first movement there occurs a strange chord, viz., a dominant minor thirteenth on a tonic pedal (C♯ FA, with a D somewhere below).

Every one of the pianoforte arrangements, whether by Winkler, Czerny, Ulrich, Tours, Pauer, Reinecke, and even Liszt, gives this extreme harmony incorrectly. One or two, e.g., Louis Winkler and B. Tours, give an emasculated version of the chord without the F; but the rest content themselves with presuming a repetition of the chord which appears four bars earlier, and of which the central note is E. It is truly astonishing that a man of Liszt's calibre should have made such a mistake, and only a little less so that Pauer and Reinecke should do the same—a curious example of carelessness and deafness combined; for all of these eminent persons must have read the score wrong, and (worse) must have never heard the chord right at the many performances which doubtless they had the privilege of attending.

I was able to point this out before a large audience at Cambridge on February 28 of this year, when I gave the first of two lectures on the Choral Symphony in connection with the performance conducted by Sir Henry Wood on March 16.

Yours faithfully,

E. W. NAYLOR.

(See further on p. 18.—ED., M. T.)

Cambridge, December 2, 1911.

[P.S.—Since writing the above I have seen two arrangements which give this chord correctly: one is Aug. Horn's, for four hands; the other, strangely enough, by Pauer, a two-hand arrangement of earlier date than that for four hands named above. How curious that he should get it right first, and wrong later!—E. W. N.]

SCIENCE AND SINGING.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—In reply to Mr. Clifton Cooke's inquiry in your last issue, I have to state that I have made a dead cock crow, and hope to do so in public at one of my own lectures. My offer was originally made to the critic of the Musical Times and not to Mr. Cooke, who had no right to expect me at his lecture.

I am quite aware that the vowel E may be produced as stated by Mr. Cooke, but that does not prove that my advice is wrong. Both methods are possible. I have written to the author of the passage which I quote from a 'System of operative Surgery,' and he tells me that his reference was to the speaking voice only. In this respect, therefore, Mr. Cooke is correct; but when he says that my deductions 'are simply preposterous' it is very clear that he is writing without knowledge, for in another part of the same volume from which I quoted, we read of a patient who had lost not only the vocal cords, but also the whole of the larynx, and yet it is expressly stated that he could sing. Again, a French medical journal in my possession speaks of a patient treated by Dr. Gougenheim who was able to sing a scale after the loss of both vocal cords.

It is a matter of interest to note that in November, 1909, Dr. Marage, of Paris, presented to the Académie des Sciences a report of some of his laryngological experiments, and in it he states that he has come to the conclusion that the vocal cords do not themselves produce tone.

May I conclude by stating that I have lately been challenged to produce a person who can sing after the removal of one or both of the vocal cords? As I do not know any individual who has undergone such an operation, I should be grateful if any reader of the Musical Times could introduce one to me. I will undertake to give gratuitous training. It is possible that I may be mistaken, because the vocal cords form an important part of the vocal apparatus.

Yours faithfully,

Bechstein Studios,
Wigmore Street, W.

ERNEST GEO. WHITE.

[We have felt it necessary to compress Mr. White's letter. Some remarks on the topic will be found in our 'Occasional Notes.'—ED., M. T.]

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The following awards have been made:—Council Exhibitions to Emmie Gregory (pianoforte); Bessie Jones, Marjorie Lockey and Lillie Chipp (singing); Antonio Piedra (violin); Edith M. Colam (violoncello); and Geoffrey Leeds (organ). The annual amount bequeathed by the late Edwin S. Dove for pupils who have distinguished themselves, was awarded to Cedric Sharpe (scholar); the Leo Stern Memorial Gift for violoncellists (£5 5*s.*) to James Pond (Norfolk and Norwich scholar); the Lesley Alexander Gift (£21) to Maurice Soester (violoncello); the Manns Memorial Prize (£4 10*s.*) to Philip Levine (scholar). The enterprise and efficiency that characterize the important public concerts of this College reached their highest point of the year in a performance of Beethoven's 'Choral' Symphony on December 14, under the direction of Sir Charles Stanford. This is referred to on page 18.

ALFRED MORGAN KINGSTON.

We much regret to have to record that Mr. Alfred Morgan Kingston died on Sunday, December 10. As his intimate friends knew only too well, he had for some time past been suffering from heart trouble. It was this distressing complaint that carried him away after a short cessation from journalistic work.

Mr. Kingston was on the musical staff of the Daily Telegraph, and in that capacity he earned a reputation for accuracy, breadth of view, and kindly sympathy for all genuine and earnest musical effort. Many young artists have been cheered by his pen without knowing the generous personality that guided it.

Mr. Kingston was born on March 1, 1860, in Chancery Lane, where he lived for twenty-five years, until the death of his father, Alfred Kingston, who was Assistant-Keeper of H.M. Public Records. He was educated at King's College School, and later at Framlingham College. He was a member of the Civil Service Musical Society, and for many years sang in the Sunday evening choir at Westminster Abbey. In his early days he was an official in the Coal Dues Office, and when this office was abolished in 1890 he retired on a pension. He was a nephew of the late Mr. Beatty Kingston, once a brilliant writer on the staff of the Daily Telegraph.

All who knew him will endorse the following testimony of the chief of the musical staff of the paper they both served: 'Generous and unassertive in all he did was Morgan Kingston, almost to a fault, and in my experience no man ever knew better his own limitations. Always keeping his mind concentrated on his work, he was loyalty itself in its performance, and was marvellously uncomplaining even when his failing health was giving him infinite trouble. In all things, whether athletic—as a swimmer he enjoyed at one time a wide reputation—or in his duty in connection with the Daily Telegraph, Morgan Kingston was the personification of all that was loyal. Simple in heart and true he was in a rare degree; and, full of the sense of dignity of his profession, entirely devoid of prejudice, endowed with an extraordinarily accurate memory, he was a colleague of inestimable value and a true friend whose worth was beyond price.'

It may be well to add that the deceased was not related to Morgan Kingston the singer.

THE 'COUP DE LA GLOTTE.'

Mr. Hermann Klein's 'Causerie.'

A large and interested audience gathered at Bechstein Hall on December 4, to hear Mr. Hermann Klein's 'afternoon causerie' on the Method of Manuel Garcia, with especial reference to the so-called 'stroke of the glottis.' Thoroughly misunderstood during the lifetime of its famous originator, this term has continued since his death to give rise more and more to laboured and futile discussion, besides, we fear, a growing measure of harmful misuse on the part of both teachers and students of the vocal art. The fact is, as Mr. Klein took early occasion to point out, that the French word coup was never meant to convey the sense imparted to it by the words 'stroke' or 'shock,' which Garcia's first English translator employed. Or, admitting either word to be scientifically accurate, it was so employed purely as a technical definition of a physiological factor in the act of phonation, as ascertained through Garcia's invention of the laryngoscope, and certainly never intended to be converted into a specific device—whether in its normal or in an exaggerated form—for procuring the clean attack of a vocal sound. As the lecturer plainly demonstrated in his own singing voice, the 'coup de la glotte' might be there in theory, but in actual practice it was not a thing to be felt or cognized by the student, much less heard by the listener in the shape of a palpable and noisy attack.

At the same time, Mr. Klein naturally regarded it as his duty to clear away the wrong interpretation put upon Manuel Garcia's suggestion ('Hints on Singing,' page 13) that a 'slight cough' may be used to ascertain the whereabouts of the glottic lips. He said he had failed to understand how the writer of the article on 'Singing' in 'Grove's Dictionary' could possibly have arrived at the conclusion that this was meant to imply that Garcia had 'insisted upon what he himself described as a "very slight cough" before a note, in order to secure a distinct attack upon it.' An illustration of what would be the result of such a mode of attack was given by Mr. Klein, and made the impossibility of the idea sufficiently manifest. Obviously, the coughing action was intended merely to aid the student to locate the presence and position of the glottis. On the other hand, the 'stroke' (if there be no better English word for it) was simply the term applied to the initial explosion following upon the release of the air compressed beneath the lips of the glottis (or vocal cords), thus starting the first of the waves at the actual pitch required for the note. The control of this imperceptible action yielded the perfect attack.

Most eloquent, perhaps, of all the arguments brought forward by Mr. Klein was his statement that Garcia had never, either at the outset or at any time during his four years' period of study, taught him the use of the 'coup de la glotte.' He sang a few bars of 'Dalla sua pace' in two different ways to show how Garcia made him employ the proper attack, instead of the insidious slur up to the note in the phrasing of a difficult passage. A rendering such as this would have been quite impossible had the singer been trained to approach a tone with the kind of click adopted by certain teachers, and unfairly caricatured twenty years ago by a famous baritone in the presence of Manuel Garcia himself. To show what the latter thought of this exhibition, Mr. Klein brought forward and read some hitherto unpublished comments written to him by his master at the time, and both these and his reproduction of the caricatures proved clearly enough how sadly the master's words had been misconstrued.

In the course of his 'Causerie' the speaker also quoted extracts from the 'Observations on the Human Voice,' submitted by Garcia to the Royal Society on March 22, 1855, wherein the word 'shock' or 'stroke' is first employed as a translation of the French coup. This purely scientific paper demonstrates the trend of the author's mind and the absolute freshness of his discovery in the following description of the glottic action in singing:

'The ligaments of the glottis . . . present a resistance to the air. As soon as the air has accumulated sufficiently, it parts these folds and produces an explosion. But at the same instant, by virtue of their elasticity and the pressure from below being relieved, they meet again to give rise to a fresh explosion. A series of these compressions and

The Competition Festival Record

No. 42.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICAL COMPETITION, PARIS—May 26, 27, 28.

The arrangements for this great event in the competition world, which is being organized by the Council of the City of Paris and is under the patronage of the French Government, are taking shape.

DATES.

The dates originally announced were May 25 (Saturday) to May 27 (Whit Monday). The representations made by us and others that the British choirs would not care to compete on Sunday have led to the following alterations:—

Sunday, May 26.—Opening of the competition. Chiefly foreign bands and choirs.
Monday, May 27.—British and other choirs.
Tuesday, May 28.—Other classes in which it is hoped British choirs will take part.

CLASSIFICATION OF SECTIONS.

The classes that appeal to British musical organizations are:

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS, BRASS AND MILITARY BANDS.
In five divisions (nine sections).

Division of excellence	One	section
,, superior	,,	,,
1st division	1st	,,
	2nd	,,
2nd ,, ...	1st	,,
	2nd	,,
3rd ,, ...	1st	,,
	2nd	,,

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS (without accompaniment).

Division of excellence	One	section
,, superior	,,	,,
1st division	,,	,,

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (S.A.T.B.) (with and without accompaniment).

Division of excellence	One	section
,, superior	,,	,,

The divisions and sub-divisions are not quite intelligible to organizations in this country. They have grown out of the French system of classification at their numerous competitions for male-voice choirs. It is difficult to see how our choirs are to choose the particular section they shall enter. The first-prize winner in, say, the chief class at Little Slocombe might be at the bottom of the second class list at Morecambe or Blackpool. In the end, we expect that our choirs will have to be permitted to enter what class they like. But it must be noted that they can only enter for one section in each general class. It is suggested that in the male-voice class the British choirs should enter in the 'Superior' class. The 'Excellence' class is for very large choirs.

If the entries in any section are too numerous to be heard by a single jury, they will be divided into groups, each of which will have equal prizes.

NEW SOCIETIES BARRED.

No entry from a Society formed for the purpose of competing at this contest will be received. Entries will only be received from Societies founded before January, 1911 (not 1912).

ENTRANCE FEES.

These range from £1 7*s.* to 8*s.*, and the amounts paid will be returned to all Societies that compete. All entries must be made and the fees paid by February 1—the latest possible date. Forms can be obtained from Mr. H. Bonnaire (see address, page 2).

TESTS.

Every Society will sing: (a) a stipulated piece, (b) an own-choice piece, and (c) a sight-test. The sight-test will be obligatory for French Societies.

(a) All the music for the (a) tests is or will be composed for the occasion. The Committee will distribute the copies gratis three months before the competition (February 26). English choirs will be supplied with copies with English words, and it is hoped also that tonic sol-fa copies will be available. We hear that M. Camille Saint-Saëns has composed the chief test for the male-voice choir, and that its subject is aviation! It therefore affords scope for some exciting music, if not for tragedy. It is said it will take twenty-five minutes in performance. If this is so it will be, so far as we know, the longest piece ever used as a competition test.

(b) The 'own-choice' piece must not be one by the performance of which a choir or band has gained a first prize within three years of April, 1912, and it must not exceed twenty-five minutes in performance. Three copies of the piece chosen must be sent to Mr. Bonnaire (20, High Holborn, London) one month before the competition.

(c) Skill in sight-singing is not taken into account in fixing the position of a choir for the prizes offered for the performance of prepared pieces. It is a separate class, and is obligatory only for French Societies, and optional for British Societies. This may be understood to mean that our Societies read too well, or that they cannot read at all.

We are informed that choral Societies in the higher divisions will have to read a 'solfege' (which suggests a piece without words) for four voices, and those in the lower divisions a test for two parts—a strange and not welcome arrangement. Five minutes will be allowed for the conductor (not the choir) to examine the sight-test. Instrumental Societies must furnish details of their instruments, so that proper parts can be prepared.

PARIS SOCIETIES—CHILDREN'S CHOIRS.

As already stated in THE RECORD, Paris Societies will not be allowed to compete against the visiting choirs. But there will be a special class for Parisians, and there will be school-children's competitions in which English and other school children may join. There will be no money-prizes in these classes, only trophies, &c.

PRIZES.

Money-prizes to the amount of £12,000 are offered. The amount may be increased to £20,000. The grand prize for male-voice choirs is £400. Other prizes are on the same liberal scale. The highest money-prizes for sight-singing are 800 francs (£32), which amount is offered to men's choirs, mixed choirs (accompanied section and unaccompanied section), and 600 francs (£24) to female-voice choirs; there are numerous smaller prizes in the lower divisions, and all through, in addition to the money-prizes, there are crowns, medals, &c. In the event of two Societies tieing for the first place, the first and second prizes are to be added and equally divided between the two Societies.

MISCELLANEOUS.

No conductor can direct more than one choir or band in the same section.

There will be prizes for conducting, consisting of medals and objects of art.

During the three days of the contest all other performances of music in the vicinity of the halls where the competitions are being heard will be forbidden.

Substantial reductions of fares have already been agreed to by the railway companies.

The adjudicators will include many of the foremost musicians in Paris. Dr. McNaught and Mr. Henry J. Iles have been invited to join the board. It seems evident that there will be a number of jurors in each section.

The Agent-General for Great Britain is Mr. H. Bonnaire of 20, High Holborn, London, W.C. He has been working very industriously in the endeavour to deal with a vast number of letters received.

Entries, accompanied by the entrance fee, must be sent before February 1 to Mr. Bonnaire, as above.

The order in which choirs, &c., will compete will be decided by a ballot which will take place at the Hôtel de Ville (the Paris Mansion House) on February 12.

Delegates will attend Societies in order to give them any assistance they may require. These delegates will be attached to the respective Societies during the whole time of their stay in Paris.

FREE CHURCH MUSICIANS' UNION.

November 23, 24, 25.

We note with gratification the success of the great competitive festival held by this organization at the Northern Polytechnic Institute. A high standard was realised in the musical programme, and entries were numerous. We give below a summary of the chief results. In all choral classes the second test-piece was left to the individual choice of the choirs:

SOLO CLASSES.

Soprano (gold medal)—Miss Marion Perrott.
Soprano and mezzo-soprano—Miss Hilda Leach.
Contralto—Miss Beatrice Woodmansee.
Contralto—Miss Edith Rhodes.
Tenor (gold medal)—Mr. Ernest Osborne.
Tenor—Mr. Sydney Bowers.
Bass and baritone—Mr. Charles E. Robinson.
Bass (gold medal)—Mr. Falkner Lee.
Pianoforte (gold medal)—Miss Amelia Flower.

ORCHESTRAS.

Test: 'Dawn' (A. E. Matt), and a work to be chosen by the orchestra.
1st. Finsbury Park Congregational P.S.A. (Mr. J. B. Shaw).
2nd. Trinity Men's Own (Mr. Thomas Hull).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Test: 'Love's folly' (Stanford).
1st. Willesden District Choir (Mr. J. S. Waddell).

1st. Forest Gate Ladies' Choir (Miss Stanley Lucas).
2nd. Hackney Ladies' Choir (Miss Stanley Lucas).

FREE CHURCH CHOIRS (18 to 26 voices).

Test: 'I was glad when they said unto me' (Sir George Elvey).
1st. Anerley Wesleyan (Mr. A. J. Heard Norrish).
2nd. Union Church, Brighton (Miss Celia Burleigh).

FREE CHURCH CHOIRS (28 to 40 voices).

(Challenge Shield Class.)

Tests: (a) 'The Lord hath done great things' (John E. West).
(b) A secular part-song, glee, or madrigal.
High Cross Congregational (Mr. Silas E. J. Mitchell).
1st. Crouch End Congregational (Mr. Josiah Booth).
Mostyn Road Wesleyan (Mr. W. J. Worth).

CHORAL SOCIETIES (20 to 38 voices).

Test: 'How sweet the moonlight sleeps' (Henry Leslie).
1st. Woolwich Co-operative Choral Society (Mr. John Hines).
2nd. St. James's Glee Party (Mr. W. J. Marshall).

CHORAL SOCIETIES (Challenge Shield Class).

(40 to 60 voices.)

Test: 'The dawn of song' (Bairstow).
Mr. G. Day Winter's Select Choir, Great Assembly Hall.
1st. Willesden District Choir (Mr. J. S. Waddell).
Queen's Road Evening School (Mr. Walter Penn).

The adjudicators were Dr. J. D. McClure, Dr. L. N. Fowles, Rev. E. P. Powell, Mr. George Dodds, Mr. Thos. Facer, Mr. J. T. Lightwood, Mr. J. A. Meale, Dr. David Thomas, and Mr. Enos Watkins.

Great credit is due to Mr. W. C. Webb for his work as general manager and secretary.

PRESTON—November 23, 24, 25.

This Festival—the seventh of the series—maintained its high character on this occasion. The tests were well chosen, and, as Dr. R. C. Brown, the distinguished President, remarked, the music was good and had given pleasure to the audience.

The choral entries exhibited much vitality. They were numerous, and the singing sometimes reached the very highest standard established in Lancashire. In the mixed-voice choir section, Elgar's 'Go, song of mine' was superbly sung by Mr. Aldous's Lancaster Choir; and Colne, under Mr. L. Greenwood, was quite as successful in the chief male-voice choir class.

The adjudicators were Mr. Harry Evans, Mr. Dan Price, Mr J. E. Adkins, Mr. S. H. Broughton, and Mr. Leonard Watkins.

The chief results were as follow:

SENIOR SOLOS.

Soprano—Miss Lily Whitaker.
Contralto—Miss Annie Armistead.
Baritone—Mr. Roland Dixon.
Tenor—Mr. Albert Leigh.
Bass—Mr. Thos. Haworth.

ST. CECILIA WORKING GIRLS' CLUBS.

November 28 and 29.

This annual gathering, held again at the Passmore-Edward's Settlement, was as usual a success in every direction. In the intermediate division no fewer than twelve choirs entered and not one failed to put in an appearance. The tests were 'Blow, blow, thou winter wind' (Stevens) and 'The Posy' (Ethel Boyce). The chief results were as follow:

	Marks.
Millbank (Miss Effie Cass)	—
St. Thomas' (Miss Hawkley)	—
Butler Street (Miss Flower)	134
Kilburn Recreation (Miss C. Philipps Keely)	—
Roehampton (Mr. Harvey Grace)	131
St. Ursula (Mr. W. Holmes)	136
Beatrice (Miss Williams)	—
Queen Victoria (Miss K. M. Evans)	—
King Edward Institute (Mr. T. Lester Jones)	—
St. Michael's (Miss K. Denison)	131
Mayfair (Mr. W. Dean)	136
West Central (Mr. Harvey Grace)	131

The tie for the first place was avoided by hearing the two choirs sing 'The angel' (Rubinstein), with the result that Mayfair won the prize. The advanced entry was as follows:

Roehampton (Mr. Harvey Grace).
1st. St. Mary's (Mr. Harvey Grace).
West Central (Mr. Harvey Grace).
2nd. Passmore Edwards (Mr. W. Holmes).

The tests were: 'Maidens, blythe and bold' (Purcell) and 'The gardener' (Brahms), and a sight-test.

Dr. W. G. McNaught adjudicated. In the intermediate sight-reading test (adjudicated by Mr. W. McNaught) King Edward Institute were first.

COLNE.—December 1 and 2.

Both as regards entries and public attendance the 1911 Festival (the twelfth) was well supported. The adjudicator, Mr. Harry Evans, expressed himself as more than satisfied with the quality of the test-pieces and the musical results obtained. The following is a summary of the entries, tests, and awards:

CHILDREN'S CHOIRS (Open).

Tests: 'Robin, sweet robin' (Bantock).
'Bells of eve' (Burniston).

2nd. Primet C. S., Colne (Mr. J. C. Mole).

3rd. Brighouse G. and M. (Mr. A. Nettleton).
Colne Road Wesleyan, Burnley (Mr. T. Robinson).

2nd. Keighley Vocal Union (Mr. W. H. Whitaker).
Brooklands Road Wesleyan, Burnley (Mr. G. Lawson).

1st. Thornton Vocal Union, Bradford (Mr. W. L. Ashton).
Bentham Musical Society (Mr. J. E. Constantine).
Independent Methodist Choir, Barnoldswick (Mr. E. Whipp).

Prizes in the solo classes were won by Miss Lily Anderton (soprano), and Mr. Watson M. Walker (bass).

NAVAL AND MILITARY MUSICAL UNION.

December 13.

A choral contest organized by the Aldershot Branch of this Union was held at the Smith-Dorrien Institute, Stanhope Lines. Six choirs entered in competition for the Challenge Cup presented by the Committee of the Smith-Dorrien Wesleyan Soldiers' Home. The tests were: 'O, who will o'er the downs so free?' and 'Heart of oak,' and the results were as follow:

Army Pay Corps.

1st. Royal Field Artillery, 31st Brigade. (Mr. W. J. Currie, Army Schoolmaster).
Royal Field Artillery, 26th Brigade.
1st King's Royal Rifle Corps.

2nd. Army Schoolmasters.
Army Service Corps.

The competing choirs before going on to the competition sang a unison song, 'Love of comrades' (Walt Whitman), composed by Dr. Cecil Roddie. Captain A. C. Corbett-Smith adjudicated.

NOTTINGHAM.—October 28.

Correction.—We regret that the result of the male-voice contest was wrongly reported in our last issue. The first prize was won by Boots Choral Union (Mr. E. S. Waring), whose singing was highly eulogized by the adjudicator (Mr. Harry Evans).

SUMMERSCALES MEMORIAL MUSICAL COMPETITIONS.

The twenty-first anniversary of these competitions will be held on the last two Saturdays in October this year. A special feature of this Coming of Age Festival will be a new mixed-voice choir contest for a handsome silver challenge shield, given by Mrs. J. B. Summerscales, of Rockfield.

The full syllabus of the Lytham (Lancashire) Festival, which will take place on June 12, 13, 14, 15, 1912, is now ready, and can be obtained from Mr. Allon Wilson, Festival Offices. Tests in 27 classes are enumerated. The music is specially attractive. There are solo-singing classes for all voices and for choirs of almost every possible variety of constitution. In the mixed-voice class Coleridge-Taylor's dramatic 'Dead in the Sierras' and Brahms's 'Vineta' are among the tests. In the male-voice choir 'Media vita' (Max Bruch) and Mr. John E. West's arrangement of 'The little Sandman' are tests.

DATES OF COMPETITIONS AND NAMES OF SECRETARIES.

COMPLETION OF

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a large number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this Section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

expansions, and of explosions occasioned by the expansive force of the air and the reaction of the glottis, produce the voice.'

This definition is highly interesting, as having been entirely new at the time it was put forward; but it must in fairness be admitted that, because the first of these 'explosions' was described as a 'coup de la glotte,' there is no just reason for assuming that its eminent discoverer required all singers to employ it as an artificial aid to the commencement of a vocal sound. The fact that he did not do so in the case of his own pupils was abundantly proved on this occasion. Mr. Klein cited the names of some of the most celebrated among them, including Jenny Lind, Pauline Viardot Garcia, Stockhausen, Mathilde Marchesi, Antoinette Sterling, and last, but not least, Sir Charles Santley, who showed his sympathy with the purpose of the 'Causerie' by attending it in person and subsequently congratulating Mr. Klein upon his successful fulfilment of his task.

SIR EDWARD ELGAR AT TURIN.

In our November number (p. 729) we gave some account of the two concerts given at the Turin Exhibition on October 18 and 20, under Sir Edward Elgar. Below we give translations of some of the notices that appeared in the Italian newspapers. They are not wanting in enthusiasm and an elegant opulence of language.

'Similar to a painter's palette, vibrating with luminosity, rich in the most vivid and varied colours, harmonizing together in a gorgeous and sumptuous concord of tints and unexpected effects, the inspiration which we had already admired,—and admired again yesterday in the Symphonic Variations and in the Introduction and Allegro for quartet and strings,—appeared veiled with a tinge of melancholy in the two works which formed the salient features of the novelties in this twenty-ninth concert, dedicated almost entirely to the music of Sir Edward Elgar. But—apart from the elegiac sentiment with which the Larghetto from the second Symphony and the Overture to the Cantata "The Dream of Gerontius"—the nobility of the ideas, the mastery of form, the certainty of development, the expressiveness of the orchestral language, the clearness and directness of the composition, asserted themselves in so serenely dominating a manner as to induce us to inquire of ourselves how it was possible that a composer such as Edward Elgar could be so little known amongst us, and how, among the many illustrious orchestral conductors whom Turin welcomed from the day that the orchestral concerts became her pride, but few had thought of revealing to us some work of the English composer.

'A breath of sadness invests both works, the Larghetto and the "Dream of Gerontius," and this sadness dilates and diffuses itself through every bar in similar language. Melancholy, shadowed with a sense of mournful, restrained resignation, which beats with no rebellious impulses, which neither shudders nor screams. Something austere, and almost æsthetic, characterizes the two works in equal measure. By degrees the mist which envelops them is dispersed by the impetuous breath of a broad, serene melody, almost like a hymn, which, in the name of faith, opens a door to hope. And then the ring of the brass; and then, in unexpected and fleeting serenity, the vibrant notes of the harps glitter like stars. Later, the dull beats of the timpani recall our thoughts to sadness, and then hope rises once again and sings anew in our hearts.'—La Stampa, October 21.

'More than the exceptional conductor, we admired in him the exceptional composer. He leaves a profound impression in our souls, both by his lofty, severe and impassioned inspirations, as well as by the elect qualities which characterize all his music—music with him so elegant, so thoughtful, and so personal an art.

'Now that we have heard many of his compositions, we are able and feel it a duty to proclaim him a symphonist of the first class. This we felt was confirmed yesterday, as well in the Variations, already noticed, as in the Larghetto of the second Symphony, and in the Introduction and Allegro for strings.

'It was easily understood, therefore, that the warm and unanimous applause which resounded through the well-filled hall at the end of each episode of the programme proclaimed clearly to Sir Edward Elgar the high esteem in which he is held by the public of Turin, before whom he was willing and able to exhibit the noblest art-work in these two memorable concerts.'—La Gazetta del Popolo, October 21.

THE FOLK-DANCE MOVEMENT.

A NEW SOCIETY.

A meeting was held at St. Andrew's Hall, on December 6, with Mrs. T. Lennox Gilmour in the chair, to form a Folk-dance Club, having its headquarters in London, with the object of preserving and promoting the practice of English folk-dances in their true traditional form. The resolution that the club be established was moved by Mr. Cecil J. Sharp, who emphasised the artistic and educational side of the movement. He said the process of transferring the people's art to another class, many of whom held a different point of view, was fraught with danger on every side from those who were not attached to the pure ideal of folk-dance in its traditional form, and that for this reason there was a demand for an organized Society that should embody this ideal. Lady Gomme seconded the resolution, and Mr. Richard Whiteing, Dr. Scott Keltie, Mr. Hercy Denman and Mrs. Arthur Sidgwick spoke on subsidiary resolutions. The committee appointed to carry on the work of the Society until the first general meeting at Stratford-on-Avon Summer School consists of Lady Gomme, Mrs. Arthur Sidgwick, Miss Maud Karpeles, Mr. A. D. Flower, Mr. Hercy Denman, Dr. R. Vaughan Williams, Mr. Cecil J. Sharp, Mr. Perceval Lucas, Mr. G. J. Wilkinson, and Miss Helen Karpeles (Hon. Sec.).

STRATFORD-ON-AVON.

The necessary number of entries having been received, it was decided to hold the projected Winter session, commencing on December 28.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

'KÖNIGSKINDER.'

Before coming to its appointed close on December 9 the brief Winter season carried on by the Grand Syndicate at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, made a bid for glory by producing Herr Humperdinck's 'Königskinder.' The opera proved to be a striking example of the unwisdom of endeavouring to develop and expand matter that has already done service. In its dramatic form as 'The Children of the King' the story was provided with incidental music by Herr Humperdinck when performed at the Royal Court Theatre some years ago. Other composers appeared in a like capacity, but they have wisely not attempted any expansion of the ideas then expressed. Herr Humperdinck has thought otherwise, and has devised a long and not particularly interesting grand opera on the subject. It was duly presented to the world (in England) on December 2. The world, however, did not seem particularly pleased at the gift. It was very nicely packed up. The scenery was a triumph of the scene-painter's art, and of its special representative on this occasion, Mr. Harry Brooke. Live geese comported themselves in knowing fashion, and the snow was very real. The last factor seemed to have a chilling effect upon the audience. The story is frankly dismal. There may be symbolism, but whatever interpretation is put upon it, it does not make matters any livelier. The King's Son is clearly an individual of Socialistic views. In his wanderings he meets with the Goose Girl, who is attracted to him as a man and not as a manifestation. They decide to run away, but the girl is restrained by the influence of the Witch in whose clutches she is. The King's Son is naturally discredited when he proclaims himself as ruler, and the couple—the Goose Girl having nullified the spell—wander forth to die miserably in the snow, after having behaved themselves like children, and in execution of Herr Humperdinck's music, having sung like two exponents of the grandest of grand opera. There are points of charm in the score, for the composer never fails to be melodious even at someone else's expense. But its style, which is that of modern opera, is far too heavy for the story, and the final duet in the snow eclipses everything else and ultimately eclipsed the opera. Fräulein Gura-Hummel and Herr Otto Wolf, both new-comers, were the children, and the other characters were taken by Herr Fönss, Herr Bechstein, Mlle. Langendorff, and Herr Hofbauer, the last a recruit to the company. The only really childish part—that of the Besom-maker's daughter—was most prettily sung by Miss Beckley. Herr Schalk conducted, but made no endeavour to be informing. The opera was played twice. For the remainder of the programme of the last stage of the season there were Wagner's 'Tannhäuser,' and the Russian Ballet, which somewhat late in the day gave Tchaikovsky's 'Le Lac des Cygnes,' and introduced us to its best member, Madame Kchessinska.

THE LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

At the first concert of the season, given by this energetic organization at Queen's Hall on December 6, the programme consisted entirely of three new choral works by British musicians. It says much for the courage of this Society that two of the works brought forward, whatever their artistic value, were not calculated to draw audiences. Mr. Charlton Speer's cantata 'The Soul of Perceval,' for soli, chorus and orchestra, has high endeavour and some real merit, but it seems to lack the needful imagination and the treatment is too sombre. A second work was Mrs. Margaret Meredith's setting of Kipling's Recessional, for chorus, organ and brass. The task of musically illustrating this dignified and thrilling poem is one that demands the highest power. If it cannot be said that Mrs. Meredith has wholly succeeded, at least it is possible to recognise the restraint and occasional breadth of her style. There is no striving for commonplace effect. The setting of the well-known refrain, 'Lest we forget,' scarcely realised the ominous mood of the poetic idea.

By far the most interesting feature of the concert was the first public performance of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's new cantata, 'A tale of Old Japan,' in which the composer returns to the style which, thirteen years ago, suddenly made him one of the most popular choral composers of the day. The effect of the performance of the new work fully justified the forecast of its popular merits given in a recent number of the Musical Times. The poem, which is by Mr. Alfred Noyes, affords a skilful composer every chance, and, moreover unfolds an intelligible, if a well-worn story—one of unrequited love. The music bubbles forth with amazing spontaneity. Variety of rhythm is a constant feature, and the idiom generally is one easily followed by ordinary listeners. Mr. Arthur Fagge, who conducted throughout the concert, contrived to secure an excellent interpretation, although he tempted providence by having only one rehearsal with the band. But as the London Symphony Orchestra was the exponent of the orchestral parts, which are full of interest and beauty, the risk of failure was lessened. The choir was in excellent condition and sang the new work with much spirit and beauty of tone. The chorus 'Peonies, peonies,' was especially well sung; another success was the section to the words 'Brow that is filled with music,' which is concerted with a soprano solo. The soloists were Miss Leah Felissa, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Maurice D'Oisly and Mr. Dalton Baker. It may be hoped that the Society will think it worth while to repeat the performance at an early date. Mr. Coleridge-Taylor, who was present, was received with much applause by the audience.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Creative talent was in the ascendant when the students of this institution gave an orchestral concert at Queen's Hall, on December 13, under the direction of Sir Alexander Mackenzie. A Concert-piece for pianoforte and orchestra by Miss Phyllis Norman Parker, two songs by Miss Alma Goatley, a Romance by Mr. Percy Bowie, and a Miniature Ballet-suite 'From a summer garden,' by Mr. Morton Stephenson, were a collection of earnest efforts that realised a high standard in every direction.

The following awards have been made:—The R. A. M. Club prize (violoncello playing) to Ambrose Gauntlett (London); the Sainton-Dolby prize (sopranos) to Phœbe Cooke (London); the Rutson Memorial prizes to Lilian G. Rickard, contralto (Swansea), and Percy Heming, bass (Bristol). The Sainton Violin scholarship held by Master Willie Davies has been extended for one year.

MR. W. H. BELL.

NEW APPOINTMENT AT CAPE TOWN.

We are glad to announce the appointment of Mr. W. H. Bell, F.R.A.M., Professor at the Royal Academy of Music, to the Principalship of the South African College of Music, Cape Town. This College has been in existence about two years, and recently, through the aid granted by the Cape Colony Department of Education, has found itself in a position to appoint a fully-qualified professional Principal. Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Hubert Parry, Mr. Oscar Beringer, and Dr. McNaught, were asked to become a selection committee, and after inquiry they unanimously agreed to choose Mr. W. H. Bell, who has had a distinguished career at the Royal Academy of Music.

Mr. William Henry Bell was born at St. Albans on August 20, 1873. His father gave him his first musical instruction, and later he became a chorister at St. Alban's Cathedral. In 1889 he heard that the Goss Scholarship at the Academy was vacant. Organ-playing was one of the chief requirements; but Bell was not an organist. Not daunted, he practised seven hours a day for a fortnight, and won the scholarship. At the Academy he came under the influence of Dr. Steggall (organ), Mr. Alfred Burnett (violin), Mr. Alfred Izard (pianoforte), and notably of Mr. Frederick Corder (composition). His creative faculty developed rapidly. 'A Prologue to Chaucer's Canterbury Tales' for orchestra was produced by August Manns on April 30, 1898, at the Crystal Palace. All Mr. Bell's compositions are distinguished by imagination and poetry, and they are very far from being 'academic' in the sense in which this word is often misused. A list of Mr. Bell's compositions (taken from the new 'Grove') is given below.

On December 15, a number of Mr. Bell's Academy friends gave him a farewell dinner at Pagani's Restaurant. The occasion was a very pleasant one, even though it was clouded by the feeling that many present were for a time losing close touch with a valued comrade. Sir Alexander Mackenzie presided. Excellent speeches were made by the Chairman, Mr. William Wallace, Mr. Frederick Corder (who spoke very highly of Mr. Bell's qualifications), Mr. Oscar Beringer, Mr. McEwen, and Mr. Bell.

The new Principal may be sure that his career in South Africa will be sedulously and sympathetically watched by his

Symphony in F, 'The open road.'

'The Baron of Brackley,' for chorus and orchestra.

An opera, 'Life's Measure,' is as yet incomplete (1910).

Music for Pageant, 1911.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The students' choir, which is so ably trained by Dr. Pringuer, gave a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' at the College on November 21. Accompaniment was supplied by four violinists, pianist (Mr. Blazey), and organist (Mr. Harry Gray). Mr. Eric Cooper sang the tenor solo. An equal state of efficiency was revealed in the playing of the orchestra at Queen's Hall on December 16, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Sachse. Two movements from Goetz's Symphony in F were interesting to hear.

London Concerts.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend' was impressively performed by this Society at the Albert Hall on December 7, under Sir Frederick Bridge's direction, and the music and singing gave abundant pleasure to a large audience. Admirable interpretations of the solos were given by Miss Alice Wilna, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, Mr. Ivor Foster, and Mr. Graham Smart.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The two most recent concerts of this Society, though of considerable interest, were of the nature of a calm before the Centenary storm. Sir Charles Stanford made a welcome re-appearance as conductor, on November 23, and gave an attractive reading of Dvorák's fourth Symphony. At the same concert Mr. Robert Radford sang, and little Sigmund Feuermann made his début in Brahms's Violin concerto. On December 5, M. Safonoff conducted, and gave a reading of Tchaikovsky's 'Symphonie Pathétique' that did not attain all the expected brilliance. Beethoven's fourth Symphony was played by Madame Fanny Davies, and Madame Lillian Blauvelt sang.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

An admirable performance of Brahms's second Symphony was the outstanding feature of the Symphony concert given under Sir Henry Wood's direction on December 2. The new works by Sibelius that were introduced—a 'Canzonetta' and 'Valse Romantique'—were delicately scored and mildly fanciful, but not otherwise interesting. Mr. Percy Grainger gave his familiar reading of Grieg's Pianoforte concerto, and Madame Lilian Blauvelt sang Mozart. Mr. Robert Newman's annual concert, which took place on November 27, again brought a large audience to hear a Wagner programme.

NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Master Louis Godowski, whose age is eleven, played Mendelssohn's Violin concerto at Queen's Hall on December 14, accompanied by the New Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Landon Ronald. The remainder of the programme was devoted to Wagner excerpts, which Mr. Ronald interpreted with admirable effect. The vocal numbers were sung by Mr. Charles W. Clark.

An excellent concert was provided by the orchestra of the Guildhall School of Music at Queen's Hall on November 24, under the direction of Mr. Landon Ronald. Haydn's Symphony in B flat was admirably interpreted. The soloists were Miss Winnie Brown (soprano) and Miss Vera Wise (pianist).

A sensation was created by the outstanding ability as a conductor displayed by Herr Fritz Steinbach at Queen's Hall on December 9, when Mr. Backhaus gave a concert with the Queen's Hall Orchestra. The feature of the occasion was a great performance of Brahms's first Symphony. The pianist played Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAS.

The Stock Exchange Orchestral Society, now conducted by Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor, gave their eighty-first concert at Queen's Hall on December 7. Grieg's 'Lyrische suite' (Op. 54), Schubert's 'Rosamunde' overture, and the rather ineffective orchestral arrangement of Rachmaninoff's Prelude, were in the programme. The male-voice choir sang under the direction of Mr. Munro Davison, and Miss Irene Scharrer played Saint-Saëns's G minor Pianoforte concerto.

An exceptionally entertaining programme of light music was chosen by the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society for the smoking concert at Queen's Hall, on December 13. It contained Berlioz's 'Carneval Romain' overture, Hérold's 'Zampa' overture, Saint-Saëns's 'Algerian suite,' Gillet's 'Passepied,' the minuet from Mozart's E flat Symphony, Sibelius's 'Valse triste,' and Weber's 'Invitation à la valse.' Mr. Arthur W. Payne conducted, and songs were given by Miss Carrie Tubb and Mr. Dalton Baker.

Two movements from Sir Frederic Cowen's 'Scandinavian' Symphony formed the centre of interest when the Strolling Players gave their concert at Queen's Hall on December 14, and they made very pleasant hearing. A setting of Portia's speech, 'The quality of mercy,' by Miss Dolores Grenfell, was sung by Miss Alys Bateman, and Mr. Aldo Antonietti played Bruch's G minor Violin concerto.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The St. Petersburg Quartet gave further concerts at Bechstein Hall on November 20 and 27, and played works by Tanéïew, Winkler, and Glière in their inimitable style. Glière was represented by a wonderfully picturesque Quartet in G minor, Op. 20.

Mr. Percy Grainger has played a prominent part in recent concerts of the Classical Concert Society. On November 22 he took part in Fauré's C minor Pianoforte quartet, and played, among other solos, his arrangement of 'The Sussex mummer's Christmas carol.' On November 29, he was associated with the Motto Quartet and Dr. Henschel. A Schubert programme was given on December 6, with the Quintet in C (Op. 163) as the chief work. On December 13, a Bach programme was carried out by Mr. D. F. Tovey, Mr. Percy Such and Mr. G. A. Walter (vocalist), with the aid of string and wind players.

Mr. Arthur Hinton's Pianoforte quintet in G minor, one of the best examples of English chamber music, was played by Miss Katherine Goodson and the Wessely Quartet at Bechstein Hall, on November 22.

The London Trio (with Mr. Patterson Parker in the place of Mr. Whitehouse, who was indisposed) added the G minor Quartet, at Æolian Hall, on November 27, to the list of Brahms's works that they have interpreted.

Messrs. Amédée and Maurice Reuchsel were introduced to the London public as both executants and composers at the concert of the Société des Concerts Francais, given at Bechstein Hall on November 29. They were represented respectively by a Pianoforte quartet and by a String trio, as well as other works.

The Broadwood concert given at Æolian Hall on November 30 was of particular interest, as it was in effect a recital by Madame Carreño, who played Beethoven' E flat Sonata (Op. 31) and pieces by Chopin and others. Songs were given by Mr. Bertram Bínyon. Members of the Hamilton Harty Sextet and Mrs. Elsie Swinton supplied the programme on December 14. A Quintet for pianoforte and wind instruments, by Fritz Volbach, proved highly attractive.

Concerts were given by the London String Quartet at Bechstein Hall, on December 7 and 19, and on both occasions Mr. Max Pauer joined the string players in Pianoforte quintets.

VOCAL RECITALS.

Dr. R. Vaughan Williams's five 'Mystical songs' produced at the Three Choirs Festival, were prominent in the list of English songs upon which Mr. J. Campbell McInnes employed his musicianship and refined vocal powers at Æolian Hall on November 21. He gave a further recital on December 16. Mr. Guy Pertwee gave a recital at Queen's (small) Hall on November 23; on the same day Mr. Charles W. Clark, at Æolian Hall, brought forward Sinding's 'Fuge' and other new or unfamiliar songs in an extremely interesting programme. His singing was, as usual, exceptionally fine.

Bechstein Hall was occupied by three lieder singers of outstanding merit—Miss Gerhardt, Madame Julia Culp and Miss E. K. Lissman—on November 25, December 3 and 7 respectively. Each has an individual style that leaves nothing to be desired.

With undiminished zeal on the behalf of the great unheard, Miss Marie Altona brought forward over twenty new songs at Steinway Hall, on November 29. An Armenian singer, M. Chah-Mouradian, connected with the Paris Opéra, made his first appearance in London, at Bechstein Hall, on December 2. Miss Lily Crawforth submitted a long all-British programme at Æolian Hall on December 7. Solos and duets were given by Mr. and Mrs. Yeatman-Griffith at Bechstein Hall on December 4. Miss Ethel Wilkes gave a concert-recital at Steinway Hall on December 4, with the assistance of Mr. George Baker and others. Other recitals were those of Miss Julia Hostater (Bechstein Hall, December 8), Madame Jennie Norelli (Æolian Hall, December 11), Mr. Robert Maitland (Bechstein Hall, December 12).

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

The most interesting pianoforte recitals that come under notice are those of M. Benno Moiseiwitsch (Bechstein Hall, November 21), who exemplified at its best the impetuous younger school; Madame Carreño (Queen's Hall, November 23), who showed the 'grand' style at its best; and Mr. Max Pauer (Bechstein Hall, December 4 and 16), who displayed the possibilities of a transcendent technique in conjunction with high intellectual powers.

Duets for two pianofortes were performed by Mesdames Yolanda Mérö and Lily Henkel at Steinway Hall on November 22. Mr. Frederick Dawson made one of his rare appearances in London, at Steinway Hall, on November 24.

Recitals were given by Miss Vera Brock (Russian music, Bechstein Hall) and Miss Hilda Saxe (Æolian Hall) on November 29; by Miss Lydia Stace (Steinway Hall) and Mr. Herbert Fryer (Queen's Hall) on November 30. Mr. Fryer was heard in Brahms's B flat Concerto with the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Mr. Oscar Eve. Other interesting recitals were those of Miss Mania Seguel (Æolian Hall, December 2), Miss Katherine Goodson (Bechstein Hall, December 5), Mr. John Powell (Queen's Hall, December 6), Madame Rose Koenig (Wagner transcriptions, Leighton House, December 7), Mr. Arthur Newstead and Miss Clara Blackburn (Bechstein Hall, December 11), Miss Mary Cracroft (Æolian Hall, December 11), Miss Tina Lerner (Æolian Hall, December 14), Mr. Nino Rossi (Bechstein Hall, December 14), Mr. Otto Dressel (Steinway Hall, December 14).

OTHER CONCERTS AND RECITALS.

Miss Isabel Hirschfeld (pianist) and Miss Helen Gough (violinist) gave a refined reading of Strauss's Sonata in E flat at Steinway Hall on November 21. On the following day Miss Adela Hamaton (pianist) and Miss Muriel Pickupp (violinist) gave an interesting recital. Vitali's 'Chaconne' was well played by Miss Marion Jay at Æolian Hall on November 22; at the same hall, on November 23, Mr. Felix Salmond (violoncellist) and Madame Norman Salmond played sonatas by Brahms, Haydn, and Grieg.

The 'Thursday Twelve-o'clocks' were continued on November 23 and December 7 at Æolian Hall, and provided a reading of Schumann's 'Etudes Symphoniques' by Miss Mathilde Verne, lieder singing by Herr von Warlich, and violoncello playing by Mr. Felix Salmond.

Miss Eva Digby O'Neill gave some excellent recitations at Steinway Hall on November 25, and the musical additions to her programme included songs given by Mr. Albert Garcia.

At the 'Concert Intime,' given by M. Zacharewitsch at his studio, on November 25, César Franck's Sonata and some clever compositions from the violinist's own pen, formed part of an interesting programme.

The unique form of entertainment evolved by Miss Nellie Chapman out of ancient dances and music was again provided on November 25, at University College, with the assistance of the Chaplin Trio and String Quartet, Miss K. Chaplin, Miss Flora Mann, and Miss Lilian Berger.

Herr Lennart von Zweygberg (violoncellist) and Herr Johan Wysman (pianist) were heard together in Brahms's F minor Sonata at Æolian Hall on November 28.

A Fantasia by Joseph Suk (of the Bohemian Quartet) was played by that admirable violinist, Mr. Carl Flesch, at Queen's Hall on November 29. Miss Madeline Drury (violinist) and Miss Muriel Price (vocalist) gave a recital at Steinway Hall on November 29.

Violin recitals were given by Mlle. Armida Senatra at Bechstein Hall on November 30, and by Mr. Aldo Antonietti at Æolian Hall, on December 6. Mrs. Henry Tremlett and Miss Ethel Nettleship (pianist and violoncellist) played Chopin's much-neglected Sonata at Æolian Hall on December 1. A joint recital was given by Miss Beatrice Dunn (pianist) and Mr. Spencer Dyke (violinist) at Bechstein Hall, on December 6.

The high expectations aroused by the announcement that Madame Carreño and Mischa Elman would give a joint recital at Queen's Hall on December 1 were not disappointed.

Mr. Vernon Warner played Franck's 'Prelude, Chorale and Fugue,' and Miss Bessie Tyas sang the 'Mad scene' from 'Lucia di Lammermoor' at Æolian Hall on December 8.

At the Barns-Phillips concert, given on December 8 at Bechstein Hall, the most interesting things in a well-chosen list were Lekeu's Violin sonata in G, played by Miss Barns and Mr. Percy Waller, and the bright singing of Miss Sylva van Dyck.

The three Misses Eyre played the pianoforte, violin and violoncello well, and sang vocal trios still better, at Æolian Hall on December 9.

Six pupils of Professor Sevcik were brought before a London audience at Queen's Hall, on December 12, at a concert given with the help of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under their teacher's conductorship. Concerto movements were played by Mr. David Hochstein, Miss Rosa Ehrlich, Miss Daisy Kennedy, Mr. Vladimir Resnikoff, Mr. Frank Williams and Miss Nora Duesberg. It had also been arranged that each violinist would give a separate recital. The first of these, given by Miss Rosa Ehrlich, whose age is only sixteen, took place at Bechstein Hall on December 14; the second was given by Mr. Frank Williams on December 15; the third by Miss Daisy Kennedy, perhaps the most promising pupil, on December 16.

Miss Elsie Hall (pianist) and Mr. Charles Draper (clarinettist) were heard together in two Brahms Sonatas at Steinway Hall on December 15.

Miss Jean Stirling MacKinlay—the English Yvette Guilbert—sang and acted with admirable skill and expressiveness at the Little Theatre on November 30.

The mixed-voice London Singverein, conducted by Mr. Otto Sondermann, gave a Mendelssohn concert at Bechstein Hall on December 1. Excerpts from 'Lobgesang,' 'Die Walpurgisnacht,' and 'Loreley' were effectively sung. Pianoforte accompaniment was provided by Señor Carlos Sobrino.

A stirring performance of 'Israel in Egypt' was given by the Alexandra Palace Choral Society on December 2, under Mr. Allen Gill's guidance. Miss Amy Simpson, Miss Nina Samuel Rose, Miss Alice Lakin and Mr. Wilbur Reed were the soloists.

The first three parts of Elgar's 'The Kingdom' were performed, with organ accompaniment, in the chapel of Lincoln's Inn on December 3, under the direction of Mr. Reginald Steggall. Solos were taken by Mr. Montague Borwell and Mr. Charles Ellison.

The South Place Sunday Chamber Concerts continue their admirable course. The concert given on December 17, when the Hamilton-Harty Sextet took part, was the six hundredth of the series.

Suburban Concerts.

'Judas Maccabæus' was performed with notable success at the Great Central Hall on November 23, by the Bermondsey Settlement Choral and Orchestral Union, under the guidance of Dr. J. E. Borland. The solo parts were taken by Miss Jenny Taggart, Miss Gertrude Wood, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. Joseph Farrington, and Mr. E. Stanley Roper was at the organ.

The spirited and deserving People's Palace Choral and Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Frank Idle, gave 'Elijah' in good style on November 25. Mr. Stewart Gardner was Elijah, and his principal associates were Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Florence Taylor, and Mr. George Foxon.

The concert version of German's 'Merrie England' was appropriately chosen for the 'Bohemian' night of the Crystal Palace Choral and Orchestral Society on November 25, and was admirably performed under Mr. W. W. Hedgcock's direction. The solo singing of Miss Agnes Christa, Miss Palgrave Turner, Miss Maud Clough, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, and Mr. Julien Henry added to the pleasure of the occasion. The Society will now turn its attention to Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan.'

At the concert of the Edmonton All Saints' Choral Society, given in the Edmonton Town Hall on November 30, Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George' and MacCunn's 'The Wreck of the Hesperus' were the chief works performed. Miscellaneous items were provided by the orchestra. The principals were Mr. Samuel Masters, Miss Marsden Owen, and Miss M. C. Bell (reciter). Miss Clara A. Sharpen was the accompanist, Mr. H. W. Appleton the principal violin, and Mr. B. J. Hales conducted.

On November 30, at the Cecil Hall, Ilford, Miss Olive Houchin, a young pianist, made a highly successful début in an exacting programme that served to reveal promising technical and expressive powers. She is a medallist of the Royal Academy of Music.

The Lewisham Choral Society—one of the oldest and most firmly established suburban organizations—inaugurated their twenty-first season with an excellent performance of 'Hiawatha,' under the direction of Mr. Frank Idle, at the Blackheath Concert Hall on November 30. The singing of the choir attained a very high artistic standard, and gave evidence of the good training received at the hands of the conductor. The accompaniments were played by a professional orchestra led by Mr. George Wilby, and the soloists were Miss Carrie Tubb, Mr. Anderson Nicoll and Mr. Thorpe Bates.

Miss Ethel Durden (a twelve-year-old pupil of Mr. Wilhelm E. Whitehouse) gave her first pianoforte recital at St. John's Hall, Lewisham High Road, on December 6. Her marvellous execution and abnormal memory roused the enthusiasm of a large audience.

Under Mr. Sidney Horton's direction, the Woolwich Orchestral Society gave a concert on December 7 at the new Town Hall. Beethoven's second Symphony and Rossini's overture, 'Le barbier de Seville' were the most important orchestral works. Songs were given by Miss Lucy France and Mr. Herbert Heyner.

The terminal concert of the Croydon Conservatoire of Music took place on December 8, and provided an excellent musical entertainment. The string orchestra played Grieg's 'Holberg' suite, a Serenade by H. Hofmann, a Bach Suite with Mr. R. E. Caffyn as flautist, and the accompaniment for Miss Irene Peckam (pianist) in concerto movements by Mozart. Miss Violet Miller sang, Miss Elaine P. Castle-Smith played the violin, and Mr. W. H. Reed conducted.

The spirit of enterprise that seems to have entered into the activities of the Dulwich Philharmonic Society with the appointment of Mr. Julius Harrison as conductor, found expression on December 9 in excellent performances of of Elgar's 'King Olaf' and Tchaikovsky's 'Symphonie Pathétique.' Miss Leah Felissa, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. John Prout were the soloists of the occasion.

At the concert given by the Royal School for the Indigent Blind, Leatherhead, on December 9, the programme included the following part-songs: 'Oft in the stilly night' (arr. J. Hullah); 'The keel row' (arr. T. Dunhill); 'Weary wind of the west' (Elgar); 'Morning song of praise' (Max Bruch): 'Wi' a hundred pipers' (arr. W. S. Roddie); 'Come, flit around' (Weckerlin); and a scene from 'Faust' (Berlioz).

St. Peter's Choral Society, Brockley, gave a well-attended and successful performance of Elgar's 'Caractacus' at St. Peter's Hall on December 12, with the support of a professional orchestra under the leadership of Mr. G. Wilby. Dr. C. J. Frost conducted, and secured a spirited and expressive reading of the choral music. The solo portions were entrusted to Miss Winifred Marwood, Mr. William Maxwell, Mr. Montague Borwell and Mr. Dan Price.

The West Ham Philharmonic Society gave their thirtieth concert at Stratford Town Hall on December 14, when Mr. J. W. Ivimey conducted the performance of an interesting programme. The chief number was Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony, which was played by instalments. Miss Violet Oppenshaw and Mr. Peter Dawson sang.

The Great Western Railway Musical Society (choral and orchestral) opened their season on December 14 in the half-yearly meeting room, Paddington Station, with a splendid performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf,' and a selection of orchestral and vocal music under the able direction of Mr. Henry A. Hughes. The soloists were Miss Winifred Marwood, Mr. Alexander Webster and Mr. Dawson Freer.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

We have had the opportunity of hearing two new German operas: 'Der Bergsee' (The lake of the mountain), by Bittner, represented at the Imperial Opera-house, and 'Kuhreigen' (La rance des vaches), by Battka and composed by W. Kienzl, the author of 'Envangelimann.' Bittner's music betrays his admiration for Wagner, which he often carries too far in the direction of strenuousness and noise. Herr Walter, the wonderful conductor, did his best for the work, but he did not make it succeed.

Kienzl's opera had a much better reception, and I am perfectly sure that it will obtain an international vogue. Herr Dr. Richard Battka has taken the theme from Bartsch's novel 'La petite Blanchefleur,' and he has adapted it with the greatest intelligence and knowledge of the theatre. It is laid in Paris, at the end of Louis XVI.'s reign and at the beginning of the Revolution. Kienzl's music is admirable; in every act it reveals the dramatic sense of the composer, and there are some very fine melodies. The performance was quite perfect, under the guidance of the manager and director, Rainer Simons.

The concert season is now in progress and all the stars come to be applauded in Vienna. I cannot tell you about all the well-known names—Ysäye, Casals, Burmester, Backhaus, Rosenthal and many others—but I must tell you of a very great success of the Wiener Singakademie, which gave a first-rate performance of Mahler's second Symphony, conducted quite perfectly by Herr Bruno Walter. The Philharmonic concerts are now conducted by Felix von Weingartner (whose absence from the conductor's desk at the Imperial Opera-house is universally regretted). The last performance was a splendid one, with two posthumous works of Dvorák, a Rhapsodie and a tragic Overture, and a new work by Heuberger,' Variations on a theme of Schubert.'

A new star in the singing heaven is Madame Tela Tsori, an Italian lady, who gave a 'Liederabend' of old Italian songs. The new operette of Lehar, 'Eva,' was a great success, and the author of the 'Merry Widow' can well be proud of it.

Music in the Provinces.

(by our own correspondents.)

BELFAST.

The works selected for the concert given by the Philharmonic Society on December 1, were 'Everyman,' by Dr. Walford Davies, and 'The wedding of Shon Maclean,' by Hubert Bath. Neither had been heard in Belfast before, nor, we believe, in Ireland. Much patient and skilful work must have been bestowed on their preparation by Dr. Fred. Koeller and the Society's conductor to secure so good an all-round performance.

The artists engaged were Madame Laura Evans-Williams, Mr. Daniel Beddoe and Mr. Julien Henry. The large audience was so pleased with 'Everyman' that a most complimentary ovation greeted Dr. Koeller at its conclusion.

This work was decidedly preferred to the other, although the cleverness of Mr. Bath's work is undeniable. Probably a Belfast audience, with its Scottish affinities, was rather critical of what is after all only 'imitation Scottish' and somewhat on a par with the 'stage Irishman,' which is considered a most affronting parody on the genuine native. The performance was on the whole very creditable, and proves that the Society is able to hold its own with many of its contemporaries elsewhere.

BIRMINGHAM.

The Royal Society of Artists' musical matinées in connection with the autumn exhibition of pictures terminated on December 9, the occasion being a memorable one, inasmuch as it was the four hundredth concert given under Mr. Oscar Pollack's direction, covering a period of twenty consecutive years. These matinées have been quite a musical institution of the city, and have been the means of introducing hundreds of vocalists and instrumentalists who otherwise would have found it difficult to get a public hearing, many of whom have since achieved notoriety in the musical profession.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society's second subscription concert of the season was given in the Town Hall on November 23, under Dr. Sinclair's able conductorship, the whole programme being devoted to a concert-recital of Wagner's opera, 'The Flying Dutchman.' It is noteworthy that the late Dr. Swinnerton Heap first conducted a concert recital of this work in 1899, seven months before his untimely and sudden death. In certain quarters some doubt has been expressed whether a performance of a work intended for the stage should be given at all on a concert platform, but there are certainly some exceptions, and 'The Flying Dutchman' is one, for the excellent performance given of it—in spite of some shortcomings in the last Act, where the choir somehow got astray—compensated for the absence of scenic effects. The cast of principals was completely satisfactory and comprised Miss Edith Evans (Senta), Miss Lucy Nuttall (Mary), Mr. Morgan Kingston (the Steersman and Erik), Mr. Herbert Brown (Daland), and Mr. Frederic Austin (the Dutchman). The orchestra, so great a factor in a Wagnerian work, did well on the whole, especially in the graphic overture.

The Birmingham Philharmonic Society's third and fourth orchestral concerts were respectively given in the Town Hall on November 22 and December 7, under the baton of Mr. Thomas Beecham. At the first of these the principal work performed was Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, Op. 83. It was by no means an ideal rendering, but still worse was the first performance here of Elgar's second Symphony, given on December 6, which at once revealed insufficient rehearsal and a certain amount of carelessness in all details, and above all a disregard of the score and its wonderful orchestral colouring. It was indeed a great pity that a work of such dimensions should have been attempted at all unless carefully prepared. The novelties introduced on these occasions were Liszt's symphonic poem 'Orphée,' and Frederic Delius's Pianoforte concerto in C minor, composed in 1897, the soloist being Mr. Arthur Cooke.

At the second Harrison concert of the current series, given on November 27, the New Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Landon Ronald, supplied the programme, the chief work performed being Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' symphony, of which a magnificent performance was given, indeed one of the best yet heard here since Dr. Hans Richter first introduced the Symphony to local judgment in 1895. The vocalist was Madame Kirkby Lunn, who sang with her customary charm.

The Arthur Catterall String Quartet gave a chamber concert at Queen's College on December 5, and were heard in Mozart's String quartet in E flat, No. 3, and Richard Strauss's early Quartet in A major, Op. 2. It was a genuine pleasure to listen to such a perfect ensemble—indeed, this Quartet is one of the very best organizations in the country. The vocalist was Miss Evelyn Wynne (a pupil of Dr. Theo. Lierhammer), an artistic singer, gifted with a rich and sympathetic voice.

The Midland Musical Society's performance of 'Elijah' attracted a crowded audience to the Town Hall on December 4, conclusively proving that the masses love their Birmingham oratorio as much as they do the 'Messiah.' Mr. A. J. Cotton had admirably prepared the work, and conducted with his customary watchfulness and care. The choir is now well balanced and thoroughly representative, the singing being characterized by fine tone and admirable gradation of light and shade. The principals, all of whom did exceedingly well, comprised Miss Mary Lund, Miss Lilian Holloway, Mr. Charles Allison and Mr. Herbert Parker, bass of Lichfield Cathedral. The organist was Mr. C. W. Perkins.

The celebrated lieder singer, Madame Julia Culp, gave a recital in the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, on December 4, in connection with Mr. Max Mossel's Drawing Room Concerts. It was her first appearance in Birmingham.

The Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, which this season is conducted by Mr. Julian Clifford, of the Harrogate Kursaal, gave an excellent concert in the Town Hall on December 9. The programme included three compositions by Mr. Julian Clifford—'a Coronation March,' a portion of a 'Suite de Concert,' entitled 'Meditation,' and a song-cycle, 'Dream of Flowers,' with orchestral accompaniment. These works appealed to the audience strongly, and denoted scholarly treatment and melodic invention. The song-cycle was sung by the Hon. Mrs. Julian Clifford with much charm and in a sweet voice. M. Benno Moiseiwitsch, a Russian pianist, gave a virile and in every way a masterly performance of Tchaikovsky's Concerto in D minor, splendidly accompanied by the orchestra.

The orchestra of the Midland Institute School of Music gave an orchestral concert in the large Lecture Theatre on December 11, under Mr. Granville Bantock's conductorship. The programme was entirely made up of compositions by Russian composers, Borodin's overture 'Prince Igor,' and Two Dances from the same work, Tschérépnin's Prelude to 'La Princesse Lointaine,' Rimsky-Korsakov's Sinfonietta in A, Op. 31, and Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto in D, Op. 35, played by Mr. Arthur Hytch.

The Birmingham Choral Union gave their second concert of the season at the Town Hall on December 16. The programme was entirely devoted to Gounod, the chief work given being 'Messe Solennelle' in G, known as the 'St. Cecilia.' It was a pity that it was sung to Latin words when an English version was obtainable. The rest of the programme was of a miscellaneous character. Mr. Richard Wassell conducted in place of Mr. Thomas Facer, and the post of organist was filled by Mr. Roberts. The principal artists were Miss Alice Hare, Mr. Sam Hempsall, and Mr. Humphrey Bishop.

The newly-formed Tala Choral Society, composed of employees of Messrs. Taylor, Law & Co., sang part-songs by Elgar, Sullivan, German, and Dudley Buck on December 12, under the direction of Mr. A. G. Cooper.

BOURNEMOUTH.

The programmes of the Symphony and Classical Concerts have contained, during the past month, many compositions of acknowledged value. Mr. Dan Godfrey has given very effective readings of Symphonies by Beethoven (No. 4 and No. 8), Raff ('Im Walde'), Dvorák (No. 4 and 'The New World'), Haydn ('The Oxford'), and on November 23 a most engrossing Wagner programme was presented. The following solo artists have appeared, many of whom added materially to the success of the concerts:—Mr. Cecil Baumer (MacDowell's Pianoforte concerto in D minor), Mr. Frederic Stock (Mendelssohn's Violin concerto), Miss Leila Doubleday (Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole'), Miss Myrtle Meggy (Saint-Saëns's Pianoforte concerto in G minor), Mr. Zeelander (solo 'cello in Volkmann's Serenade for strings), Miss Frances Fox (Violin concerto in A, by Mozart), and Mr. Mauritz Speelman (Romanza for viola, by the soloist). Among the large number of compositions of especial interest which have been accorded a hearing may be noted Georg Schumann's 'Liebesfrühling' overture, H. Osmond Anderton's 'Spring Idyll,' Glück's 'Iphigénie en Aulide' overture, Sibelius's 'Finlandia' tone-poem, Mendelssohn's 'Hebrides' overture, and Bruce Steane's 'Dreadnought' suite. Mr. Anderton's music is of an unusually fresh and attractive order, and Mr. Steane's Suite contains numerous passages of a pleasing and ingenious turn, in spite of the fact that it reveals inexperience in the matter of orchestral expression. Suggestive as it is of an orchestral transcription of organ music, yet it has many features which exemplify the hand of an able musician. The concerts have been distinguished by visits from Mr. T. F. Dunhill and Mr. Julius Harrison for the purpose of conducting performances of their own compositions. The first was represented by his 'Pixies' suite, and the second by his tone-poem 'Night in the mountains.'

The musical events of the month have also included recitals by Mr. Ernest Schelling, Miss Ellen Terry, Madame Carreño and Mischa Elman, Sapellnikoff (orchestral concert), and a vocal and instrumental recital by Madame Luisa Sobrino, Señor Sobrino, and M. Emile Sauret.

Mr. T. W. Surette's series of lectures on 'Great Symphonies' continues to attract enthusiastic audiences, the lecturer's valuable help in the elucidation of symphonic problems meeting with ready response in a town wherein that type of music is so much to the fore. The musical illustrations by the Municipal Orchestra have been of the greatest assistance.

The Municipal Choir materially enhanced the reputation it acquired at its inaugural concert a few weeks back by its capital rendering on December 12 of Mendelssohn's ever-green and ever-impressive masterpiece, 'Elijah.' The 250 voices are fairly well balanced in point of numbers, but in actual performance the altos belie their numerical strength by their lack of power. The choir sang with breadth and vigour, and the careful training they had received was made apparent in many ways; the chief deficiency at present is the lack of knowledge respecting the various shades of tone colour. The principal soloists were Miss Emily Breare, Mr. Ernest Pike, Miss Violet Elliott, and Mr. Peter Dawson: of an efficient quartet, the first-named was the most successful.

BRISTOL AND DISTRICT.

The concert by the Bristol Symphony Orchestra at the Victoria Rooms, on November 22, was a gratifying success. It was a Tchaikovsky night, the compositions including the Overture to 'Romeo and Juliet' 'Capriccio Italien' and symphony 'Pathétique,' with two vocal excerpts delivered by Mr. Montague Worlock. Mr. Herbert Parsons conducted with considerable ability.

There was a large attendance at Redland Park Hall on November 25, when a complimentary concert was given by the St. Saviour's Church Choir to Mr. George Herbert Riseley, their popular choirmaster and organist. The choir were heard in several part-songs, which they delivered with effect, and at intervals there were songs by Miss Gertrude Winchester, Master Rex Jones, Mr. Herbert Thomas, and Mr. Herbert Heyner. Mr. Otto Milani contributed violin solos, and Mr. G. Herbert Riseley conducted admirably.

The first Ladies' Night since the death of Mr. W. J. Kidner, the originator and first conductor of the Society of Bristol Gleemen, was held at the Victoria Rooms on November 29. Mr. C. W. Stear, the newly appointed conductor, directed a performance which contained several interesting features. After the National Anthem, Mr. Kidner's part-song 'Lull me to sleep' was given In memoriam. A few novelties were presented, and Mrs. Herbert Hutchinson contributed songs.

On December 2, the Bristol Musical Society held their first concert for the season, and delighted a large audience at the Victoria Rooms with a creditable interpretation of the newly arranged concert version of Bizet's 'Carmen.' In addition to members of the Society there were fifty boys trained by Mr. C. W. Stear, who directed the performance.

The Bristol New Philharmonic Society, on December 8, gave their winter concert at the Victoria Rooms, and in the presence of a large number of persons performed Parts I. and II. of Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio' for the first time in Bristol. The soloists were Madame Katherine Gerrish, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. Frederick Ranalow. The orchestra, comprising the principal players of the city, was led by Mr. Harold Bernard, and Mr. C. W. Stear was at the organ. Mr. Arnold Barter conducted with much ability, and the audience were deeply impressed by the music of Bach. After the interval Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll' was nicely executed, and then Mendelssohn's 'First Walpurgis Night' delighted the hearers.

At Knightstone Pavilion, Weston-super-Mare, on December 7, the Philharmonic Society performed Spohr's 'Fall of Babylon' very creditably, Mr. Edward Cook conducting. The principal soloists were Miss Alice Boaden, Miss Gertrude Winchester, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, and Mr. Charles Tree; with Miss M. Martin, Mr. R. H. Ward, and Dr. Roxburgh in minor parts. Mr. F. S. Gardner was leader of the orchestra.

On December 12, the Clevedon Philharmonic Society interested a large audience at the Public Hall with their interpretation of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' the performance being directed by Mr. Edward Cook. The solos were entrusted to Miss Winifred Thomas and Mr. R. Hoare Byers, Miss Triffie Parker being associated with Miss Thomas in 'I waited for the Lord.' Mr. F. S. Gardner was the leader. A miscellaneous selection was given in the second part of the concert.

There was a crowded audience at Colston Hall on December 16, when the Bristol Choral Society gave an admirable performance of 'The Messiah,' under the able direction of Mr. George Riseley. The choir and band numbered 550; the leader being Mr. Harold Bernard. The soloists were Madame Emily Squire, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. Percy Heming.

CAMBRIDGE.

'THE MAGIC FLUTE.'

The production of 'Die Zauberflöte' at Cambridge by a body of amateurs, on December 1 and 2, was an event of very great interest, and the effect of it may reach far beyond the University town. The beauty of Mozart's music has not had the power of overcoming the prevalent opinion that the libretto is a tissue of absurdities; hence the work is practically never heard in England, even the grudging acceptance given to 'Don Giovanni' and 'Figaro' being denied it. In Germany, the opera is performed fairly frequently, but its presentation is of a conventional character, and the glaring weaknesses of the book are fully apparent. At the Cambridge performance, on the other hand, these weaknesses seemed to matter little. The weak points were disguised as far as possible, the opera was made a fairly coherent whole, the undoubted opportunities for effect were freely used, and the tone of refinement and artistic feeling that inspired the whole production were a joy to the large audiences who came from all parts of England to see it. The promoters of the scheme had one advantage in their favour—they were not hampered by tradition, which is injurious as often as it is beneficial. The whole staging of the opera may be considered to be original, and it was clear that infinite pains had been taken. The scenery, admirably simple and effective, was painted entirely by amateurs, Messrs. A. T. Scholfield and Maurice Gray. The general design of the dresses and the whole singularly beautiful colour-scheme were planned by Mrs. Sydney Cockerell.

In the important matter of a translation, Mr. E. J. Dent furnished a version of the greatest merit, admirable as English, humorous when required, and as regards declamation fitting the music like a glove. Mr. Dent had also published, in view of the performance, a brochure giving the history of 'Die Zauberflöte,' containing an investigation of the many mysteries surrounding it.

Regarding the performance, as amateurs were concerned it is only needful to say that it was quite extraordinarily good. Naturally some acted and sang better than others, but the unanimity of the ensemble told of months of patient work directed by instructors of unusual capacity. Of the non-residents, Mr. Clive Carey, formerly so prominent in Cambridge music, generously placed his professional abilities at the service of his old friends, and gave a delightful representation of Papageno, a most finished performance vocally and histrionically. Miss Victoria Hopper displayed considerable dramatic ability, and her high notes were very telling in the part of the Queen of Night. Miss Marchant was a vivacious Papagena. Of those who were concerned in the details of the production, we must mention specially Mr. Dent, on whom fell the bulk of the preliminary work; Mr. Scholfield, who acted as stage-manager with Mr. Dent; Mr. Clive Carey, who, in addition to his admirable singing and acting, directed the production of the opera; and Dr. Rootham, who, as conductor, was responsible generally for the musical ensemble, and who is to be particularly congratulated on the result of his work with the chorus and orchestra. The latter, though largely composed of local players, was thoroughly efficient.

We have learned several things from the production of the 'Magic Flute.' First, that it is an effective opera, granted intelligent management; secondly, that an elaborate work like this can be admirably given by amateurs; and thirdly, that good English is an excellent language for opera. Perhaps in time our first and third deductions will be appreciated by those dignitaries who control opera in England.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

A mark of development which is prominent in the Three Towns is the progress made by choirs of churches and chapels, many of whom have indeed formed themselves into Societies, and have given public performances away from the home atmosphere without losing their distinctive style. Mount Gold Wesleyan Choir sang Maunder's 'Olivet to Calvary' on November 22, conducted by Mr. Normington. The choir, numbering sixty, sang with freshness and good attack.

Sherwell Choir showed the excellence of the training they receive from Mr. A. C. Faull, the organist and choirmaster, when, on November 29, they sang difficult part-songs by Pinsuti, Stewart, Faning and Jensen, also an effective Serenade written by Mr. Faull. The choir may always be depended on for culture of tone and keen sense of pitch and attack. Four young members sang the 'Garden scene' from 'Faust.'

Wesley Choir (Ebrington Street), on December 4, for the second time came before the public in the Guildhall, and acquitted themselves remarkably well in several choruses and part-songs. Mr. A. R. Pappin conducted, and must be congratulated on the artistic and executive excellence of the chorus-singing.

Dr. Weekes's Choral Society, assisted by members of the Orchestral Society and others, sang several numbers from 'Samson,' on December 6. Mr. Walter P. Weekes conducted, and obtained a performance showing many good features.

On the same date, the choirs of King Street and Stonehouse Wesleyan Sunday School (both remarkably good choral bodies) gave a combined concert at St. Levan, conducted by Mr. H. Woodward, with Mr. C. Palmer at the organ. A new choir is being formed at Devonport by Mr. F. W. Chorley, with the intention of performing 'St. Paul' in March next.

The Symphony played by Dr. Weekes's Orchestral Society at their eleventh subscription symphony concert, on November 22, was Gade's in C minor. An Overture (Op. 124) by Beethoven was new to the district, and a Prelude (Op. 23) by Bubeck was interesting. A Concerto for viola and orchestra by Hans Sitt was given, with Miss Dorothy Thomas as soloist. A deeply-impressive interpretation was given by Mr. R. G. Evans and his Symphony Orchestra of the Tchaikovsky 'Pathetic' Symphony, on December 5. Miss Helen Sealy, accompanied by the band, played artistically the solo part of Mozart's Concerto in G for violin and orchestra, and Mr. David Parkes was the vocalist. At the conclusion of the programme two strongly imaginative pieces (Prelude and Russian Dance) by Baroness E. Overbeck, were excellently played.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

At the annual meeting of the Exeter Diocesan Choral Association on December 14, the committee with great regret accepted the resignation of the office of secretary by Mr. W. H. Rogers, whose energetic and thorough work for eight years has had marked results on the efficiency and progress of the organization. The Rev. R. C. B. Llewellyn was elected to fill the vacancy. Mr. T. Roylands-Chanter was re-elected choirmaster. The last Festival was the twenty-fifth held by the Association.

The Axe Vale Musical Society, at their annual meeting on November 22, decided to continue rehearsals and to give a performance in the Spring of a small work with the view to undertaking an important one early next season.

Three very difficult part-songs by their fellow-townsman, Mr. Hubert Bath (now of cosmopolitan reputation), were produced by the Barnstaple Musical Society on December 4. These were respectively 'Summer wind,' 'Dream wind,' and 'Spring wind,' each being a highly impressionistic piece, wherein remarkably original effects were gained without loss of essentiality. Elgar's 'Go, song of mine' was also given, and other pieces by Pearsall (in ten parts) and Cooke were sung. Dr. H. T. Edwards conducted, and played pianoforte solos.

After many years of suspension the Kingsbridge Choral Society had again awakened to life and work, and with a membership of eighty voices (rather weak in the tenor section) sang 'The Messiah' on December 7, conducted by the Rev. A. Donaldson Perrott. Good attack and vitality were commendable features of the singing. Bampton Choral Society has also been revived after a lapse of several years, and gave a concert on December 8, at which 'The daughter of Jairus' formed part one, and choruses and part-songs the second part of the programme. Mr. J. E. Coren conducted.

It is greatly to be regretted that Mr. T. H. Webb—who, as conductor of the Torquay Musical Association has done great things for choral and orchestral music in this town,—has been obliged to resign after twenty years' work. The thirty-eighth concert of the Association (and the last under Mr. Webb's baton) was given on December 8. The choir sang Lee Williams's eight-part 'Festival Hymn' (unaccompanied), conducted by Mr. W. Twining, and Dvorák's 'Te Deum,' conducted by Mr. Webb, who also directed the orchestra in Schumann's Symphony in E flat (Op. 97) and pieces by Smetana and Dvorák; also the Beethoven Concerto in G (No. 4), for pianoforte and orchestra, with Mrs. W. H. Mortimer as soloist. At the close of the concert Mr. Webb was presented with a purse of gold.

The excellent quality, attack and energy of the Exeter Choral Society, of which Mr. Allan Allen is the conductor, gave fine effect to the stirring choruses of 'The Messiah' on December 13, though exception must be taken to the exaggerated tempo at which one or two were taken. The undoubted strength and life of this Society of something under two hundred singers should make for it a good career, and with experience and continued training the obvious faults which attach themselves to a young choir will doubtless disappear. Mr. Allan Allen has been appointed chorus-master of the Exeter Oratorio Society and Western District Choral Association, in amalgamation, of which Dr. D. J. Wood and Dr. H. J. Edwards are co-conductors. A concert performance of 'Maritana' was given at Holsworthy by the local Philharmonic Society on December 14, the choruses being excellently sung. Mr. H. H. Bennett conducted. Part-songs were sung in the second part of the programme.

The newly-formed Teignmouth Amateur Operatic Society has decided to perform 'The Old Guard' (Planquette) in February, under Mr. Percy Foster. Already forty-five members have been enrolled. Castellano's Italian Grand Opera performed a répertoire at Torquay during the week opening November 20. The cadets and others of the Royal Naval College at Dartmouth gave performances of 'H.M.S. Pinafore,' beginning on November 29; and Exmouth Operatic Amateur Society during the week beginning December 4 gave performances of 'The Pirates of Penzance' with great success.

CORNWALL.

Marazion Male-Voice Choir sang several of the 1911 musical competition test-pieces at Hayle on November 29, under the direction of Mr. J. H. Trudgen; and on December 8 the same fine force of male voices repeated the concert at Heamoor.

An unusually fine performance of 'Samson' was given on December 7 by the Redruth Musical Society, an excellent choir and band trained by Mr. Matthew Clemens. Even for a Cornish choir the male sections were splendid in vigour and resonant quality, and the singing of the combined parts was inspiring in attack, precision and verve. Falmouth Philharmonic Society sang 'The Messiah' on December 11, under Canon Corfe. Much success was achieved by Miss Edith Blight, particularly in the declamatory numbers. Mr. T. Herbert Williams directed the Truro Philharmonic Society in the same oratorio on the following day, the Falmouth singers supplementing the city choir. Mr. A. C. Faull, of Plymouth, took his choir from Sherwell Church to Liskeard on December 13, where they exemplified the best features of part-singing in pieces by Faning, Elgar, Pinsuti, &c.

A musical and dramatic entertainment was given at Redruth on December 7, including a cantata, 'Queen o' May,' conducted by Mrs. Rich.

A special word of encouragement and of commendation is due to the Penzance Orchestral Society for the fine playing they exhibited at their eighth concert on December 8, conducted by Mr. Walter Barnes. They showed much progress under continued study. This season ladies have been admitted for the first time, with good results, in the string section, and the symphony performed was Beethoven's C minor.

DUBLIN.

The chamber-music recitals held at the Royal Dublin Society rooms during the past month have been given by the Hamilton Harty Wind Trio (Messrs. Fransella, J. L. Fonteyne, and Hamilton Harty); the Brodsky Quartet, who played Tchaikovsky, Op. 22, and Beethoven, Op. 132, magnificently; Sapellnikoff, who, besides playing several solos, joined Dr. Esposito in duets for two pianofortes; and Dr. Sinclair, of Hereford, whose organ recital was the last before Christmas.

On December 12, the University of Dublin Choral Society gave a performance of Parts I. and II. of Bach's 'Christmas oratorio,' the Magnificat in D, and Sweelinck's motet, 'Hodie Christus natus est.' The solos were sung by Mr. Evan Cox and Mr. Thomas Marchant, and members of the Society. Dr. Charles Marchant conducted, the band being mostly amateur.

On December 14, the Dublin Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah,' under Dr. Charles Marchant's direction. The soloists were Madame Borel, Miss Muriel Ashe, Mr. Dan Jones, and Mr. Montague Borwell.

Dr. R. R. Terry lectured on 'English music in the 16th century' at a meeting of the Tonic Sol-fa Association on December 9.

EDINBURGH.

Messrs. Paterson's orchestral concerts continue to draw crowded audiences. The lesser-known orchestral compositions brought forward during the month include Charles Macpherson's 'Fantasy on four Scotch tunes,' Carse's Symphony No. 2, in G minor, and Debussy's 'Ronde de Printemps.' The soloists have been Misses Alice Wilna and Kathleen Howard (vocalists), and Messrs. Backhaus and Arthur de Greef (pianists). Conducted by Mr. T. H Collinson, the first of the present season's series of concerts given by the Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society was held in the Music Hall on November 22. The programme comprised orchestral works by Wagner, Beethoven, Henselt, Dvorák, and Saint-Saëns, and the performances reached a high standard of excellence. Mr. Harrison Cook was the vocalist.

The first of three chamber concerts was given in St. Andrew's Hall, on November 24, by the Millar-Craig String Quartet—a local combination of talented players consisting of Misses Emily Buchanan, Theo Hunter, Dorothy Chalmers, and Mr. D. Millar-Craig. The playing possessed rare balance of tone, unanimity of attack, degree of attention to nuance and purity of intonation. Miss Marion Richardson contributed songs.

Mr. John Tait's Select Choir gave an enjoyable concert to a large audience in the Oddfellows' Hall on November 25. The programme comprised choruses and part-songs, chiefly unaccompanied, by Elgar, Eaton Faning, Parry, and other composers, and these were sung with a degree of steadiness and refinement of tone which gave evidence of careful training, and reflected much credit on the conductor. Songs contributed by members of the choir, and violin solos by Mr. Fred J. Falconer, lent agreeable variety to the programme.

The second of four historical concerts was given in the University music class-room on December 8. The programme comprised compositions, chiefly vocal, by J. S. Bach and his sons. Herr Georg A. Walter, of Berlin, was the tenor vocalist, and the accompaniments were played by Frau Elsa Walter. Mr. Arthur Dace contributed pianoforte solos, and the organist was Mr. Matthew Shirlaw.

GLASGOW.

The second Classical Concert on November 21 was notable for the first performance in Glasgow of Elgar's Symphony No. 2, in E flat. The work was splendidly interpreted by the Scottish Orchestra, under Mr. Emil Mlynarski. At this concert Mr. Mischa Elman gave a fine performance of Max Bruch's first Violin concerto in G minor.

The Choral Union made their first appearance this season on November 28, when, conducted by Mr. Mlynarski, the first and third Acts of 'Lohengrin' were presented. The choral-music, rehearsed by Mr. Henri Verbrugghen, the new chorus-master, was sung with very good effect, and the instrumental part was brilliantly played by the Scottish Orchestra. Of the six solo vocalists, Mr. Morgan Kingston deserves a special word of praise for his singing of the part of Lohengrin. At the fourth concert, on December 5, Mr. Wilhelm Backhaus appeared for the first time under the auspices of the Choral and Orchestral Union, giving a virile interpretation of Schumann's Pianoforte concerto in A minor. The programme also included two novelties—Mr. A. von Ahn Carse's second Symphony in G minor, which was at once received with popular favour, and the waltz from Strauss's 'Rosenkavalier.' From November 27 to December 9 the Quinlan Opera Company fulfilled a fortnight's engagement at the King's Theatre, including in their répertoire two operas new to Glasgow audiences, viz., Puccini's 'The girl of the Golden West,' and Debussy's 'Prodigal Son.' As a pleasant change from these music-makings came the Glasgow Glee and Madrigal Society's concert on December 11. This fine body of singers, ably conducted by Mr. B. W. Hartley, gained the first prize in the chief choral class at the recent Glasgow (competitive) Festival, and on the present occasion they showed themselves quite worthy of that distinction. Their programme included unaccompanied pieces in various styles, and their performance was worthy of all praise.

This was notably so in J. C. Bach's motet, 'I wrestle and pray,' and Elgar's 'Weary wind of the west.' Miss Gertrude Haworth and Mr. Henry Brearley were the solo vocalists. At the fifth concert, on December 12, the principal number on the programme was Brahms's first Symphony in C minor, which was finely handled by Mr. Mlynarski. Miss Kathleen Howard as solo vocalist made an excellent impression.

At the third monthly meeting of the Glasgow Southside Society of Organists, the Rev. Dr. G. Bell lectured on 'Present hindrances to the advance of church music in Scotland.'

The management of the Choral and Orchestral Union gave by way of experiment a mid-week afternoon orchestral concert, but it was only moderately successful in point of attendance, and the experiment has not been repeated. The Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. W. T. Hoeck, gave their first concert of the season on December 13. The programme included Saint-Saëns's first Violoncello concerto in A minor (Mr. Mozart Allan, soloist), the Overture to 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' and an attractive Serenade for orchestra by Percy Pitt, the last number being played for the first time in Glasgow. Mr. Alexander Richard's vocal contributions gave variety to the purely instrumental programme.

GLOUCESTER AND DISTRICT.

The first and miscellaneous concert of the Cheltenham Philharmonic Society was held in the Town Hall on Wednesday, November 29, when a programme based not on the popular, but wholly on the musical standard was submitted, including Bach's No. 3 (in G) 'Brandenburg' Concerto; and Mozart's 'Eine kleine Nachtmusik.' The soloists were Mr. Frank Mullings, tenor, and Mr. Charles Collier, harpist. The orchestra acquitted themselves faultlessly, while the choir created a good impression, being heard to advantage in Sir Hubert Parry's 'Come, pretty wag, and sing.'

An interesting programme of instrumental and vocal music had been prepared for the first concert of the Gloucester Choral Society's fifty-first season, held at the Shire Hall on Thursday, December 14. It comprised the 'Casse Noisette' suite (Tchaikovsky), 'Summer Sports' (A. Herbert Brewer), 'Landerkennung' (Grieg), and 'Cavalleria Rusticana' (Mascagni). The principal vocalists engaged for the caste named were Miss Marion Perrott, Miss Edith Clegg, Mr. Samuel Masters, and Mr. Dalton Baker. Dr. A. Herbert Brewer conducted, and the forces assembled under his baton numbered about 200. 'Summer Sports,' the suite for chorus and orchestra which was written by Dr. Brewer for the Gloucester Festival of 1910, comprises numbers for mixed, male, and female voices, and the music preserves and accentuates the spirit which the old writers of the words must have wished to convey. At the annual general meeting of the Society, Sir Hubert Parry was elected President in place of the late Mr. Joseph Bennett.

During the early part of the season, popular organ recitals on the new organ at the Shire Hall were given by Dr. Brewer, but were relinquished upon the commencement of the free recitals at the Cathedral.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

Conducted by Sir Frederic Cowen, the programme of the fourth Philharmonic concert, on November 21, included MacDowell's Pianoforte concerto No. 2, in D minor, masterfully played by Madame Carreño, whose skill was more apparent than the vitality of the music. Mr. Wallace's orchestral poem 'Villon' made an entirely favourable impression by its fanciful suggestiveness and piquant scoring, and Mr. Daniel Beddoe was successful in his tenor songs. The choir were called upon for only one item, Elgar's powerful and patriotic choral peroration to the 'Banner of St. George,' 'It comes from the misty ages.' The Symphony No. 1, in G minor, by Kalinnikoff, was finely played by the orchestra. It shows immense musical talent, but hardly creative genius.

At the fifth concert, on December 5, Mr. Thomas Beecham fulfilled his engagement as a 'Guest-conductor,' and his readings were heard with attention and approval, especially in Mozart's Symphony No. 34, in C, a seldom-played but very beautiful work in three movements, Delius's English rhapsody 'Brigg Fair,' Wagner's Prelude and Liebestod, Liszt's symphonic-poem 'Orphée,' and Strauss's humoresque 'Till Eulenspiegel.' In this varied selection Mr. Beecham showed thorough command and interpretative instinct. The vocalist was Madame Julia Culp, a lieder singer of high distinction. Her beautiful voice was exhibited in groups of songs by Beethoven and Schubert, the latter having pianoforte accompaniments played by Mr. Beecham. Two choruses by Dr. Ethel Smyth, especially 'Hey Nonny No,' showed her powers as a constructive musician. Her writing for the voices is instrumental in scope and difficulty. The chief feature of the music is its strenuous and exciting rhythm and vivid orchestral colouring. Further rehearsal of the chorus part would have been an advantage to the performance.

Sir Edward Elgar's second Symphony had its first performance here on December 2, when the composer himself conducted the Hallé Orchestra. The music makes all the greater impression by the absence of any avowed programme. Even the prefixed Shelley lines, 'Rarely, rarely comest thou, Spirit of Delight,' give no clue. But pure music of this calibre is a delight in itself. Together with the first Symphony and Violin concerto, this second Symphony belongs to the realm of the great and noble in music. The programme also included Brahms's 'Tragic' Overture and Saint-Säens's 'Rouet d'Omphale.'

The Akeroyd Symphony Orchestra concerts continue to receive considerable and deserved support. The visit of M. Sapellnikoff, on November 28, was the occasion of a brilliant performance by him of Liszt's E flat Pianoforte concerto; and Schumann's fourth Symphony in D minor, conducted by Mr. Akeroyd, was heard to advantage.

The eleventh Festival of the Liverpool Church Choir Association was successfully held in St. George's Hall on December 7. The choir of 497 voices was made up of contingents from the choirs of twenty churches in Liverpool, Bootle and Birkenhead, and the singing was marked by not only powerful and balanced tone, but also by commendable attention to expression. A great improvement was noticeable in this respect, and there were welcome instances of effective piano singing. The desire of the committee to encourage the practice and performance of standard church music was illustrated by the seven choral items in the music-book, viz., 'The Lord is great in Zion' (W. T. Best), 95th Psalm 'O come, let us worship' (Mendelssohn), Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat, and anthem for tenor solo and chorus 'My God, I love Thee' (G. J. Bennett), anthem 'For all the Saints' (C. T. Reynolds), 'Hymn to the Trinity' (Tchaikovsky), especially well sung, unaccompanied, by the quartet and chorus, and Handel's Coronation anthem 'Zadok the Priest.' The eminent organist of Lincoln Cathedral, Dr. Bennett, at the invitation of the committee, came specially to conduct his music. His Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat is a concise and masterly setting, and was sung extremely well. His anthem is also typical of modern cathedral music of the highest class. Dr. Bennett played as an organ solo two movements from the 'Sonata Pastorale' of Rheinberger, under whom he had studied composition. Upon his adjudication, the anthem, 'For all the Saints,' was selected from the nineteen compositions sent in anonymously by local composers. It proved to be the work of Dr. C. T. Reynolds, organist of Christ Church, Claughton, Birkenhead, who conducted an interesting performance of his effective setting. In addition to Dr. A. L. Peace's organ accompaniments, there were four brass instruments and drums. The soloists were Master Eric Bates (London College for Choristers), Mr. James Barr (alto, Liverpool Cathedral), Mr. John B. Render (tenor, Lincoln Cathedral), and Mr. George Parker (bass, Manchester Cathedral), who was especially successful in songs by Brahms and Dvorák. An immense audience included the Lord Bishop and many representative citizens.

Public interest in the revival of old music was agreeably stimulated by Mr. Cecil Sharp's lecture on 'Folk Dances and Songs,' on November 23, and by the second visit of Miss Nellie Chaplin and her excellently-trained company of singers and dancers, who appeared at the New Repertory Theatre on the afternoon of November 29.

The musical Monday evenings provided for the members of the new Rodewald Concert Club continue to find favour, especially with those who find their pleasure in chamber music heightened by permission to smoke.

As usual at the Harrison concerts the Philharmonic Hall was quite filled on November 29, when Mr. Landon Ronald conducted the New Symphony Orchestra in an emotional reading of the Symphony 'Pathétique.' Madame Kirkby Lunn was especially successful in her songs, notably in two of Elgar's 'Sea Pictures,' During the past month there has been abounding activity displayed by the various orchestral Societies which provide such useful outlets for the musical proclivities of the rising generation. On November 25, the Liscard Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Philip Smart, played Wallace's tone-poem, 'The passing of Beatrice,' and Mr. John Lawson, as soloist, was heard in the first movement of Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto. The Anfield Orchestral Society, which Mr. William Faulkes conducts, on December 6 played two movements from Beethoven's seventh Symphony and Grieg's A minor Pianoforte concerto, in which Miss Elizabeth Stocks cleverly played the solo part. The vocalists were Mrs. G. B. Russell and Mr. D. R. Thomas.

The Oxton and Claughton Orchestral Society, at their concert in the Birkenhead Town Hall on December 9, played German's 'Richard III.' overture, Dvorák's 'From the New World' (three movements), and Boëllmann's Symphonic Variations (solo 'cello, Mr. Walter Hatton).

The Blundellsands Amateur Orchestral Society, which has the advantage of Mr. V. Akeroyd's conductorship, played a programme which denoted high aim at their concert on December 9.

Conducted by Mr. H. P. Allen, the Catholic Philharmonic Society gave a most satisfactory performance of 'The Messiah' on December 12.

Mr. Hamish MacCunn's 'Lay of the Last Minstrel' was revived by the Post Office Choral Society at their concert on December 14, when Mr. Percival H. Ingram conducted a creditable if not wholly satisfactory choral performance.

The Welsh Choral Union's performance of 'The Messiah' on December 16 completely filled the Philharmonic Hall with an engrossed and enthusiastic audience who came not only to enjoy the familiar music, but also in the expectation of having choral thrills. In this they were not disappointed. The principals were Miss Emily Breare, Miss Mabel Braine, Mr. Daniel Beddoe, and Mr. Thorpe Bates—four singers fully equal to all demands. Mr. Akeroyd led the orchestra, with Mr. Branscombe at the organ.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

Quite possibly the past year may prove to have been the turning-point in music on the 'grand' scale in Manchester. Under the altered conditions the Hallé Society has ventured on certain excursions into territory never hitherto thought worth a visit, and the executive and public alike have found great delight in the newer Elgar and Bantock, and in the dreaded Dukas, Delius, and Max Reger: the reception accorded to the works of these men has not been tepid, as some sages prophesied. 'Young Manchester' has been quite justified in its assertion that the best modern work was just as good a 'box-office draw' as the most revered of the classics. What was wanted in the programmes was a judicious blend of old and new, and conductors who would bring enthusiasm to the task of interpreting both styles of music. It is not at all improbable that the idea of a permanent conductor may not be revived; certainly there is much to be said from all sides in favour of a series of first-rate visiting conductors. In that way probably more satisfaction is given in the long run to all grades of musical opinion and taste, whilst the gain to the orchestra can scarcely be estimated.

The concert of his own works conducted by Elgar on November 23 was most inspiring. The string-playing throughout the evening had exceptional warmth and sonority. From no other English orchestra does one get quite the same impression of the Elgar 'Allegro'—probably because Richter always carried a heavy bass-string department, and this wholesome practice is still maintained. Alike in this work, the second Symphony and the 'Enigma' variations, the ear was ravished by the wonderful character of the string orchestration.

The more one hears this Symphony No. 2, the greater is one's surprise at its lukewarm reception in some quarters. Of course, at a first hearing, one cannot grasp so much of it as, say, of a Tchaikovsky symphony: there is not the same reiteration of ideas dinned into the memory by constant repetition. Comparatively speaking, Elgar's ideas are more fugitive, but the thread of the argument is never lost, and its logical development is unfolded by this orchestral orator in language so noble and lofty in thought, and of such compelling nervous force, that the hearer is spellbound. It would be difficult to name in orchestral music anything of more dazzling brilliance than the closing pages of the first movement, or to excel the noble eloquence of the final movement; emotionally, the appeal of the Larghetto is greatest of all.

The 'Grania and Diarmid' music had not been heard before in Manchester, and the greater glories of the other music only served as an admirable foil to its serener atmosphere.

On November 30, December 7 and 14, following Elgar, came Schalk (of Vienna) and Müller-Reuter (of Crefeld), both of them disciples of orthodoxy. Schalk's programme was quite familiar in aspect, with the notable exception of Max Reger's 'Variations on a Merry Theme by Adam Hiller': here everybody was on unfamiliar ground, nothing of Reger's orchestral work having been played before by the orchestra. Considering the limited time for its rehearsal, the performance was so good as to make one eager to gain further acquaintance with it. The general impression left by Müller-Reuter's conducting on December 7 (miscellaneous) and 14 (Berlioz's 'Faust') was that it scarcely came up to expectations. The choir had necessarily been devoting much time to Bantock's 'Atalanta in Calydon' for December 25, and probably the preparation of 'Faust' had suffered somewhat in consequence. The solo vocalists, too, left much to be desired, only Mr. Thorpe Bates having any of the requisite qualifications for the task.

The part played by Mr. Simon Speelman's Saturday night cheap-priced 'Promenade' smoking concerts is increasingly important. It cannot be seriously urged that they are antagonistic to that of the Hallé concerts, though they may draw a small proportion of their audience from Hallé habitués. More probably they are educating many people into potential Hallé concert-goers. The orchestral schemes and the list of solo-instrumentalists leave little to be desired. The vocal solos are on a distinctly lower level.

The second Harrison concert brought Mr. Landon Ronald on one of his rare visits to Cottonopolis. Apart from the 'Pathetic' Symphony, his programme contained items of quite ephemeral interest. Madame Kirkby Lunn, the most distinguished musician given to the world by Manchester in the last twenty years, was warmly welcomed.

Although the Schiller Club premises have passed under the auctioneer's hammer, Mr. Carl Fuchs is making valiant efforts to keep alive these famed chamber-concerts, the venue having been transferred to the Milton Hall, one of four new concert-rooms recently opened here. At the first of this series in the last week of November the Manchester Trio were the instrumentalists and Miss Hilda de Angelis, the vocalist.

The executive of the Manchester Vocal Society, acting on Mr. Herbert Whittaker's advice, have reduced the number of concerts but raised their quality. At the first meeting of the current season Elgar's 'O wild west wind,' Havergal Brian's 'Shall I compare thee to a summer's day,' and Lee Williams's 'Festival Hymn' were the chief choral features.

The last two meetings of the Manchester Musical Society were mainly devoted to music written by two Manchester musician-critics—Mr. Bonavia and Mr. E. Duncan—much of the work being still in MS. In both cases probably the finest indication of the merit of their work was found in songs, Miss Myra Dixon capturing much of the elusive charm of Mr. Bonavia's exquisite miniatures. Mr. Duncan had the assistance of Miss Hilda de Angelis, Miss Annie Worsley, and Mr. Ramsey Clarke.

On November 24 and 25, there were large attendances at the University to hear Mr. Cecil J. Sharp lecture on 'English folk-song,' and to discuss with him the place of folk-song in education.

In Blackburn there is a sad deficiency of good halls suitable for choral concerts, but this will be remedied ere long. Dr. Bairstow's Society gave a miscellaneous choral and orchestral concert before Christmas, the conductor's speedy recovery from dangerous illness being very gratifying. Another

Blackburn organization worthy of note is the Ladies' Choir, directed by Mr. F. Duckworth, now in its seventh season. The choir only sings twice annually, for charitable objects, and the programmes invariably include items of unusual interest. Their programme on December 7 included Mackenzie's 'Rhyme of the four birds,' and one of Colin Taylor's 'Slumber songs of the Madonna.' Miss Myra Dixon and Mr. Bridge Peters were the solo vocalists, and Miss Elsie Haworth, the violinist.

NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

Sir Frederic Cowen conducted the first performance here of 'The Veil,' on November 29. The sincerity, beauty, and deep expressiveness of this momentous work roused widespread admiration. The choral portions were sung with agreeable tone and expression by the Choral Union, and the Scottish Orchestra responded with sympathy to their former conductor. Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Maurice d'Oisly and Mr. Herbert Brown were a well-balanced quartet. Elgar's spiritual 'Go, song of mine' (conducted by Dr. Coward), Wagner's 'Wahn, Wahn' (sung by Mr. H. Brown), and Cowen's 'Phantasy of Life and Love' completed the programme.

The Musical Union, a week later, gave the fourth performance in the city of Brahms's 'Requiem,' and the first performance of 'Three hymns from the Rig Veda,' by Gustav von Holst. These latter works are elevated in tone, and interesting examples of the ability of our English writers. The choir have sung so much ultra-modern choral music that Brahms was well within their powers, and an excellent performance of both works was given. A local orchestra was engaged, and Mr. E. L. Bainton conducted a most creditable concert.

Handel's 'Israel in Egypt' was admirably sung by the augmented choir of the Wesleyan Church, North Shields, on Tuesday, December 5. Mr. H. Y. Dodds conducted, and strings and organ supplied the accompaniments. On December 7, Mr. N. Kilburn conducted Berlioz's 'Faust,' which was given by the joint forces of the Sunderland Philharmonic Society and the Leeds Symphony Orchestra. A word of praise must be accorded to the latter for their playing. The soloists were Miss A. Forrest, Messrs. M. d'Oisly, Thorpe Bates and R. W. Waddle.

The Harrison concert on December 1 provided fine performances of a hackneyed programme. Tchaikovsky's 'Symphony Pathétique,' the 'Figaro,' and 'Tannhäuser' Overtures, and numbers by Svendsen and Saint-Saëns were the orchestral items; two songs of Elgar, and one each of Saint-Saëns and Landon Ronald were the vocal numbers. Nothing but praise can be given to the executants, the New Symphony Orchestra and our great singer, Madame Kirkby Lunn. Mr. Landon Ronald showed fine technique as a conductor. There are two chamber concerts to record: the Newcastle Musical Society opened their season with Stanford's Trio, Op. 73, and Dvorák's Pianoforte quartet, Op. 87. Three of Debussy's beautiful pianoforte pieces were played by the pianist, Mr. E. L. Bainton, and the other performers were Mr. A. Wall (the director of the Society), Mr. J. Walker and Miss H. Page. At the Chamber Society's concert on December 8, three soloists new to the city appeared, viz., Mr. Ernest Schelling, Signor Antonio de Grassi, and Madame Julia Culp, who proved herself a consummate artist.

[Erratum.—The chamber concert on November 10, announced in the December issue as being given by the Chamber Music Society, was given by the Classical Concert Society.]

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

A visit from Miss Janet Hemsley and Mr. Alfred Pratt, provided the musical public of this city with a great treat on November 23. Miss Hemsley is a native of the city, and maintained a high vocal standard, embracing works from Morley to Elgar, and including vocal works by the best French, German and Italian composers. Two songs which she included in her programme were from the pen of Mr. Alfred Pratt, and were warmly received. At the pianoforte, Mr. Pratt gave, as solos, Schumann's Romance in F sharp major and Godard's 'Valse Chromatique' in a style that made one regret that he had not a larger share in the programme.

The works selected for the first orchestral concert of the Sacred Harmonic Society, on November 30, were selected from the compositions of Wagner and Tchaikovsky; and, considering the strong amateur element in the performers, reflects the greatest credit on all concerned, but especially on Mr. Allen Gill, the conductor. The Symphony 'Pathétique' was probably the best performance, and the most enjoyed, though the 'Siegfried Idyll' and the 'Casse Noisette' Suite were more popular. Mr. Harry Dearth contributed two vocal items, 'Wolfram's Address' and 'Dalland's Aria,' and in the latter was compelled to give an encore. The noticeable feature of the concert was the beauty of the string tone throughout the programme, without any reflection on the wood-wind or brass.

The first of a new series of Subscription Concerts for charitable purposes was given on December 5, when the New Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Landon Ronald, gave fine performances of Tchaikovsky's Symphony 'Pathétique,' Mozart's 'Figaro' Overture, Svendsens' 'Carneval in Paris,' Saint-Saëns's Symphonic-poem 'Le Rouet d'Omphale,' and Wagner's Overture to 'Tannhäuser.' The concert was one of the best we have had in Nottingham for some time, and with the assistance of Madame Kirkby Lunn's magnificent singing of Elgar's 'Sea Songs' and the great aria from 'Samson and Delilah,' as well as a charming song, 'O lovely night,' by the conductor, started the series in brilliant style.

OXFORD.

On October 21, Mr. A. J. Slowcombe and his party gave an interesting chamber concert in the Assembly Room of the Town Hall, the programme being devoted to the works of Schubert, of which the principal items were the Quartet in E flat, Op. 125, No. 1, and the Quintet in C, Op. 103. Later in the term they gave a Dvorák programme with equal success.

On October 28, in the New Masonic Hall, Miss N. Chaplin with her string quartet, gave another of her welcome old-time dance and musical recitals, which proved throughout not only enjoyable but eminently educational.

On October 31, Herr Kreisler gave a violin recital in the Town Hall, assisted by Miss Roma Tremaine (vocalist). On November 3, Miss Fanny Davies, with Signor Pablo Casals and Mr. Campbell McInnes, gave a Bach-Beethoven-Brahms concert in the Town Hall, to a full and appreciative house. On November 22, in the Town Hall, under the auspices of the Musical Club, the Akeroyd String Quartet, with the addition of Messrs. Draper, James, Borsdorf and Tovey (playing clarinet, bassoon, horn and pianoforte respectively) gave an excellent chamber concert, the chief items being Schubert's ever-welcome Octet, Op. 166, and his String quartet in C minor. A Trio by Mr. Tovey was also included for pianoforte, clarinet and horn, the composer playing the pianoforte part. The Trio is entitled 'Style tragique,' and this accurately describes the work. On November 25, in the Town Hall, Herr Sapellnikoff and Mr. Theodore Byard gave a pianoforte and vocal recital which was well attended. On November 29, Madame Carreño and Mischa Elman gave a joint recital in the Town Hall, when both artists well maintained the reputation they gained here two years ago.

We now come to the great event of the term—or, rather, of the whole year—Sir E. Elgar's oratorio, 'The Kingdom,' given by the combined forces of the Bach Choir and the Choral Society on December 6, in the Town Hall, under the composer's direction. The performance, being the first in Oxford, was looked forward to with unusual interest, and the house was crowded. The soloists were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. Campbell McInnes, each and all eminently satisfactory in every way. The chorus-singing was uncommonly good—with excellent tone, clear enunciation, and dramatic expression whenever the situation required it; in fact, we have rarely, if ever, heard the choir sing better, and their response to the conductor's baton was most praiseworthy. We do not wonder that Sir E. Elgar was pleased with the performance of his beautiful work, for it could scarcely be otherwise; and here we may say that Sir Edward himself received quite an ovation. If we singled out any numbers for special congratulation and well-won praise, they would probably be the duet, 'At the beautiful gate,' by the two lady soloists, and the chorus, 'Lord's Prayer,' immediately before the conclusion. The chorus preparation for this oratorio, and for the Bach motet, 'Jesu, priceless Treasure,' which followed, was in the capable hands of Dr. H. P. Allen, the conductor of both Societies, and he must be warmly congratulated on the thoroughly excellent artistic results achieved.

On December 7, Sir Walter Parratt, the Professor of Music, gave his usual terminal lecture in the Sheldonian Theatre upon a most attractive subject, that of 'Coronation Music in various Reigns,' which drew together an appreciative audience. The illustrations—'The King shall rejoice' (Handel), 'I was glad' (Parry), and 'O hearken Thou' (Elgar)—were sung by the Magdalen College Choir under the firm guidance of Dr. Roberts. Mr. Ley, the Cathedral organist, presided at the organ.

The usual Sunday evening concerts at Balliol College have been continued throughout the term under the able direction of Dr. Walker.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

'THE VEIL' (COWEN).

In being among the earliest of provincial music bodies to introduce Sir Frederic Cowen's 'The Veil' to their subscribers, the Sheffield Amateur Musical Society were but carrying out a tradition of enterprise which has now existed for nearly fifty years. The performance was given in the Albert Hall, Sheffield, on Tuesday, December 12, under the direction of Sir Henry J. Wood. The choir, trained by Mr. J. A. Rodgers, numbered 280, and the orchestra 65, the latter being identical with that organized for the Sheffield Promenade Concerts. The soloists were Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Violet Oppenshaw, Mr. Joseph Cheetham, and Mr. Frederick Ranalow. Mr. J. W. Phillips was organist. Keen interest was manifested locally in the performance, with the result that the hall was filled.

The scope and features of Cowen's deeply serious and beautiful work are by this time sufficiently well-known. It is generally conceded that in 'The Veil' he has been moved to produce the best that is in him, just as in dealing with a somewhat kindred theme, Elgar, in 'The Dream of Gerontius,' worked at white-hot inspiration. What is the more remarkable in 'The Veil' is that a composer who is past middle-age should have so thoroughly assimilated the most advanced modern idiom, methods and technique, and attained such apparently spontaneous and invariably happy results. Nowhere has the composer shown his versatility more convincingly. The mysticism of the opening section and of the 'Dream-vision'; the poignancy of that most beautiful scene depicting the mother bereft of her children, and the cumulative grandeur of the chorus, 'O Flower of all the world,' are instances of how, under the stimulus of the poet, he has assumed with perfect mastery styles foreign to his usual and earlier manner. In the exquisite love duet, 'Come to me, clasp me,' he is, however, entirely himself, and the music wells out, page after page, in easeful flow, thoroughly Cowenesque and entirely charming. The work was heard with rapt attention, and there can be no doubt as to the deep impression made on both audience and performers by Sir Frederic Cowen's latest and finest work. The performance was technically admirable in all respects. The difficult score was smartly and expressively played and sung with beautiful tone and precision, and the soloists were most happily chosen. The polished diction of the choir aided greatly in the elucidation of Buchanan's text. A group of Wagner selections followed, completing an extremely successful concert.

The Sheffield Grand Opera Society gave their second series of performances at the Lyceum Theatre in the early days of December. 'Aïda,' 'Tannhäuser,' and 'Faust' were produced under the direction of Mr. J. Duffell. The notable feature of the week was the fact that all the vocal principals and chorus were amateurs.

The Sheffield Choral Union gave an interesting revival of Handel's 'Saul' on December 4. There was a small but competent orchestra, and the choir, which has much improved under the training of Mr. Horace Reynolds, sang intelligently and—the sopranos especially—with good tone. The work suffered from the absence of an organ, for which Handel wrote an independent part.

The St. John's (Abbeydale) Choral Society, which Mr. G. A. Seed trains and conducts, gave a varied concert at Dore, performing Jensen's 'Feast of Adonis,' Lloyd's 'Hero and Leander,' and a new setting, for eight-part chorus, of the 23rd Psalm by Mr. Harper Seed, son of the conductor. The new work, which is a cappella, and contains some scholarly and effective writing, was well received.

Mr. Thomas Brameld's labours at Rotherham and Doncaster are having a good influence on music in the surrounding districts. 'Hiawatha' and Bath's 'Wedding of Shon Maclean' in the latter town proved that progress in efficiency and enthusiasm is still being made.

A crowd of suburban and district concerts have been given during the month. Among these may be mentioned performances of 'The Daughter of Jairus' at Brunswick Chapel (conductor, Mr. W. A. Hamer); 'The Last Judgment' at Sheffield Parish Church (Mr. T. W. Hanforth); Smieton's 'King Arthur' by the Fulwood Amateur Musical Society (Mr. Walter Skinner); 'Hymn of Praise,' at Sharrow Parish Church (Mr. O. C. Owrid); Gade's 'Psyche' by the Norton Lees Choral Society (Mr. A. Bagshaw); and Gade's 'The Erl King's Daughter,' by the Heeley Philharmonic Choral Society (Mr. W. H. Moseley).

Among the numerous performances of 'The Messiah' given in the city and district one only, that by the Sheffield Musical Union, under Dr. Coward, may be referred to. It was notable in that Dr. Coward showed a disposition to modify some of his more drastic alterations and innovations, and that the total effectiveness of the performance was strengthened rather than weakened. The choir sang very finely. The soloists were Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Lucy Nuttall, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Joseph Lycett.

The senior and junior branches of the Sheffield Philharmonic Orchestra have given concerts, the former playing neatly and with directive and interpretative intelligence Schubert's 'Unfinished Symphony,' and the latter Sibelius's tone-poem 'Varsang.' The violins, numbering seventy-two in the junior orchestra, played very smartly.

The Amateur Instrumental Society, which has progressed recently under the direction of Mr. Frederick Dawson, gave a concert in the Albert Hall. The programme included Liszt's 'Rhapsody' No. 1, and Bach's 'Brandenburg' Concerto No. 2. Mr. Alfred Barker played the solo in Max Bruch's Violin concerto in G minor.

YORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.

Opera has been rife at Leeds during the past month. At the time of writing my last despatch, the Quinlan Company was drawing crowded houses by performances of works, two of which were entirely new to Leeds, whereas only one, 'Tannhäuser,' could be considered familiar; while the Moody-Manners Company, which came here on December 4, relied on five of the most hackneyed of operas, and had very poor houses indeed. The one exception was Saint-Saëns's 'Samson and Delilah,' and it attracted the largest audience of the week. There should be an obvious moral to this, and one trusts operatic managers may lay it to heart.

Chamber music has also been well represented. On November 29 the Leeds Trio gave Chevillard's Trio in F (Op. 3), Schubert's Quartet in A minor, and Richard Strauss's Pianoforte quartet in C minor, an interesting and varied programme, to which they did justice. On December 6 Miss Simpkin's ladies' string Quartet were heard at one of the Bohemian Concerts, in Novák's Quartet in G, a Mozart Quartet, and an interesting Trio sonata by Boyce, a charming example of the 18th century English school. On December 13 the Rasch Quartet, with Mr. Noel Bell as pianist, were heard in a brilliant performance of Novák's Pianoforte quintet in A minor, together with Schubert's String quartet in G (Op. 161), and on December 15 Messrs. Mason and Maude gave another of their programmes of Sonatas for violin and pianoforte. A very enjoyable violin recital was given at the Leeds Musical Evening on December 12 by Pecskai, who gave a fine interpretation of Bach's seldom-heard Fugue in C, Max Bruch's Concertstück in F sharp (Op. 84), and other works, which displayed his very high technical and artistic attainments. Miss Kathleen Smith, a young pianist of high artistic aims, gave a recital on December 18, the programme of which included representative works of the masters of pianoforte music from Bach to Chopin, Debussy, Sibelius, and others.

Choral music has been less in evidence, but on November 22 the Leeds Choral Union, under Dr. Coward, gave the third Act of 'Lohengrin,' with Miss Perceval Allen as Elsa, Mr. Maurice d'Oisly as Lohengrin, and Mr. Herbert Parker as the King. Elgar's Coronation Ode, a work closely identified with this Society, completed the programme. On November 29 the Leeds New Choral Society, of which Mr. H. Mathias Turton is conductor, gave with much success three short cantatas—Stanford's 'Revenge,' Elgar's 'Banner of St. George,' and Sir Frederick Bridge's 'Forging of the Anchor.'

OTHER TOWNS.

At the time of writing the Christmas 'Messiah' celebrations are beginning; another work which is now being heard more frequently, than one could have imagined possible twenty years ago, is Brahms's 'German Requiem,' which is becoming very generally recognised as an appropriate oratorio for Advent-tide. It was given by the Leeds Parish Church Choir, under Dr. Bairstow, on December 8; on December 15 he also conducted it in York Cathedral, Mr. T. Tertius Noble on this occasion taking the organ part, and the Leeds Parish Church Choir being associated with that of the Cathedral. Mr. C. H. Moody conducted it at Ripon Cathedral on December 19, and accounts of other similar performances in different Yorkshire towns indicate that this great masterpiece is now making its way to a gradually widening recognition.

At Bradford the programme of the Subscription Concert on November 24 was chiefly sustained by Miss Elena Gerhardt and Mr. Jean Gerardy, duets for two pianofortes being contributed by the Misses Satz. At the next concert of the series, on December 15, Berlioz's 'Faust' was given, with Miss Mabel Manson, Mr. d'Oisly and Mr. Thorpe Bates in the principal parts. The Hallé Orchestra and the Bradford Festival Choral Society co-operated in a brilliant performance, which was ably conducted by Prof. Müller-Reuter. On December 13, Mr. S. Midgley, with Mr. Dunsford as violinist, gave the last of the three recitals, at which all Beethoven's Sonatas for pianoforte have been heard, an interesting experiment which has been attended with much success. The Bradford Permanent Orchestra's concert on December 2 was under the conductorship of Mr. Fricker, who gave excellent performances of Haydn's 'Clock' Symphony, Liszt's 'Les Preludes,' Tchaikovsky's 'Capriccio Italien,' and other works; a popular yet artistically interesting programme which was well received.

At Halifax the Choral Society, of which Mr. Fricker is the conductor, gave, on November 23, 'The wedding of Shon Maclean,' which went with capital spirit. Some extracts from 'The Flying Dutchman' and some clever 'Vagabond Songs' by Mr. E. B. Farrar were among the features of the miscellaneous second part. Miss Blanche Tomlin and Mr. Thorpe Bates were the principals. On December 9, the Halifax Madrigal Society, under Mr. Shepley, gave an exposition of the very finest type of unaccompanied choral singing. Madrigals by Morley and Wilbye, and part-songs by Bantock, Debussy and Mackenzie, furnished excellent material, and were sung with a perfection of finish deserving the highest praise. At the second of the Halifax Chamber Concerts, on December 8, the Rawdon-Briggs Quartet played string quartets by Mozart, Schubert, and Brahms, and a large audience indicated that these concerts are generally appreciated. The Huddersfield Subscription Concert, on December 12, was of a miscellaneous kind, Mr. Backhaus being the pianist, Mr. Gomez the violinist, and Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Lucy Nuttall, and Mr. Robert Radford the vocalists. The Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society, under Mr. Ibeson, gave a popular, if not very distinguished, programme of part-songs, &c., on December 5, the flute-playing of Mr. Fransella and the singing of Miss Perceval Allen being other features of the concert. On November 28, the Keighley Musical Union gave Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' under Mr. R. H. Moore's direction, with Madame Copeland, Mr. Hempsall, and Mr. Chippendale as the principals.

At the second of the Wakefield Chamber Concerts, on December 14, the London String Quartet, with Mr. Julian Clifford as pianist, were heard in Dohnànyi's String quartet in D flat (Op. 16), and Dvorák's favourite Pianoforte quintet, together with a 'Fantasy' for quartet by H. Waldo Warner, one of the crop of similar pieces which have resulted from recent competitions. Their ensemble was as near perfection as it is possible to attain. The Hon. Mrs. Clifford was the vocalist.

At York, the Cathedral organist, Mr. T. Tertius Noble, has been giving fresh proof of his versatility and energy by writing music for a comic operetta, 'Killibegs,' which was produced by an amateur company very successfully on November 27. The libretto, by Mr. K. E. T. Wilkinson, is a clever example of the type associated with the Gilbert and Sullivan operettas, and Mr. Noble's tuneful music follows with marked success the same excellent precedent. The parts were generally well sustained, but a word of special commendation is due to Mr. Dennis Drew, who showed himself to be in voice, style, and stage-bearing, a baritone admirably suited to the requirements of light opera. On December 11, the York Musical Society, also under Mr. Noble's conductorship, gave the first and second portions of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' trilogy with much success, the choir, though over-balanced by ladies' voices, singing in a very pleasant style. By a curious coincidence, the very same programme was given on the same evening by the Scarborough Philharmonic Society, under Dr. Ely. The chorus-singing was regarded as one of the Society's best efforts, and the orchestra was also above the average. The Brodsky Quartet appeared at the Malton Subscription Concert on December 12, and played in masterly fashion Quartets by Beethoven (Op. 18, No. 6, in B flat) and Schubert (D minor). There was a good audience, and considerable enthusiasm, from which it may be inferred that there is a genuine appreciation of good music in and near this little country town. Lady Norah Noel was the vocalist.

At the Hull Philharmonic Society's concert, on December 8, Goetz's Symphony was the chief feature of the programme, and was conducted by Mr. J. W. Hudson. Miss Alice Wilna was the vocalist.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ABERDEEN.—A miscellaneous concert of considerable interest was given by the Peterhead Choral Society on November 24, under the direction of Mr. Warren T. Clemens. The principal interest was divided between the excellent singing of the choir in Faning's 'Moonlight,' Elgar's 'Britons, alert!' (from 'Caractacus'), Wood's 'Music when soft voices die,' Sullivan's 'The long day closes,' and the contributions of Mr. Watkin Mills as bass soloist.

ABERGAVENNY.—The Choral Society gave their annual concert on December 11. The works performed being 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'The death of Minnehaha.' The orchestra played the Overture to 'William Tell' and Järnefeldt's 'Præludium.' The soloists were Miss Gladys Ashton, Mr. Albert Maiden, and Mr. Herbert Tracey. Mr. W. R. Carr conducted.

BATH.—The concert given by the Choral and Orchestral Society on December 5, under the direction of Mr. H. T. Sims, was an occasion of exceptional importance, for it provided an excellent performance of Sir F. Cowen's 'The Veil.' The choral singing was worthy of the occasion, and well realised the deep expression demanded by the music. The orchestra, led by Mr. J. W. Duys, was specially strengthened and did justice to the score. An adequate quartet of soloists was found in Miss Mabel Manson, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Joseph Reed and Mr. Dan Price. Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George' and Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite formed the remainder of the programme.

BISHOP AUCKLAND.—An unconventional programme was chosen for the concert of the Auckland Musical Society on December 6, for the chief choral numbers were Dr. Somervell's 'The forsaken merman' and Schumann's 'The New Year's song,' both of which deserve more attention than they get. The singing was up to the high standard which choirs customarily attain under Mr. N. Kilburn's direction. The soloists of the concert were Miss Eveline Birks and Mr. Davis Brooks. Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' suite was one of the independent contributions of the orchestra.

CARDIFF.—'The Veil' was performed at Cardiff, where it was originally produced, by the Musical Society on December 5. Sir Frederic Cowen conducted, and again secured an enthusiastic welcome for his work, upon the preparation of which great artistic care had evidently been bestowed. The choral singing was in every way worthy of its theme, and equally good work was done by the soloists, Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Lottie Wakelin, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Maurice D'Oisly, Mr. W. E. Carston and Mr. Herbert Brown. Mr. Herbert Wyman was at the organ.

CHELMSFORD.—Mr. Frye's Choral Society gave their first concert of the season on November 27 at the Shire Hall. The choir sang in most finished style folk-songs and part-songs by Elgar, Brahms, Boughton and Coleridge-Taylor. The fine String quartets by Smetana (in E minor) and Schubert (in D minor, posthumous) were excellently played by Mr. G. H. Wilby, Mr. E. R. Wilby, Mr. C. Woodhouse and Mr. C. A. Crabbe. Miss Effie Martyn was the soloist, Miss Ethel Warmsley the accompanist, and Mr. F. R. Frye conducted.

CHORLEY WOOD.—The newly-formed Chorley Wood Choral Society held their first public performance on December 4, in St. Andrew's Church Room. The chief work selected for performance was 'Hero and Leander' (C. H. Lloyd), in which the solo parts were taken by Mrs. Waddy and Mr. Walter Kingsley. The choir, numbering sixty voices, pleasantly surprised the packed audience with their excellent tone, smart attack, and expression. Mr. Harry Field, organist of the Parish Church, conducted.

DITTON (LANCASHIRE).—The St. Michael's Church Musical Society gave their first concert of the season in the Schools, Hough Green, on December 13, when Sullivan's cantata 'On shore and sea' was performed under the conductorship of Mr. Albert Orton, who also presided at the pianoforte. The remainder of the programme consisted of part-songs and solos.

GUILDFORD.—Successful performances of Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' and Tchaikovsky's 'Capriccio Italien' were given by the Guildford Choral and Orchestral Society on December 16, before a crowded audience. The soloists were Miss Beatrice Spencer, Miss Gurney Jones, Mr. Roland Jackson, and Mr. Stewart Gardner. Orchestra and choir numbered 150. Miss E. G. Midgley was the leader of the orchestra, and Mr. Archibald Hollier the conductor.

HAYWARD'S HEATH.—A successful concert was given by the Musical Society on November 28, when Dr. C. H. Lloyd's cantata 'Hero and Leander' was performed under the direction of Mr. R. J. Beckett. Both in this work and in a selection of part-songs the choral singing was highly creditable. Solos were given by Miss Dorothy Kennard and Mr. Percy Hubbard.

HOBART (TASMANIA.)—Performances of Handel's oratorio 'Judas Maccabæus' were given in Davey Street Congregational Church on October 30 and 31. The soloists were Misses Daisy Mangan and Gertrude John, Miss Sylvia Mills, Messrs. Arthur Lowe, W. Wallace O'Brien, and Mr. Harold Paton. The choruses were sung by a choir of fifty voices. The accompanists were Mr. J. Scott Power (city organist) and Miss Mary Corvan (pianist). The oratorio was conducted by Mr. George A. Jackson, organist and choirmaster of the church.

HYTHE.—The Choral Society gave the first concert of their ninth season on November 23. Gade's Trio in F, Op. 42, and Beethoven's in G, Op. 1, No. 1, were played by Miss M. Ashworth, Mr. W. F. Harris, and Dr. A. T. Froggatt. The choir sang a number of madrigals, glees, and part-songs, under the conductorship of Dr. Froggatt. Miss Aimée Parkerson was the solo vocalist.

LEAMINGTON.—An all-Scotch concert was given by the Madrigal Society, under the direction of Mr. E. Roberts West, on November 30. The chief works on the programme were appropriately chosen from those of Sir A. C. Mackenzie, and were his 'Cotter's Saturday night' for the choir and his 'Scottish Rhapsody' (Op. 21) for the orchestra. Fitting solos were supplied by Miss Edith McCullagh and Mr. Ivor McKay.——Gounod's 'Faust' was performed by the Choral Society with great success on December 7. Miss Emily Breare, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Humphrey Bishop sang the solos, and Mr. H. M. J. Gibbon conducted.

LONGREACH (QUEENSLAND.)—The praiseworthy efforts of Mr. H. Cautley-Cautley to foster musical life in this neighbourhood have resulted in the formation of a small orchestra, which co-operated with the Male-voice Choral Society in a concert given at the Shire Hall on October 11. The principal numbers in the programme were the 'Sailors' Chorus' from Wagner's 'The Flying Dutchman,' Dudley Buck's 'In vocal combat,' Sullivan's 'The lost chord' (as arranged by Brewer and scored by the conductor), Cobb's 'A message to Phyllis,' and Elsasser's choral-waltz 'Love reigneth.' Both choir and orchestra did creditable work under Mr. Cautley-Cautley's direction. The soloists were Misses Murray and Peterson (vocalists), Miss Donovan (pianist), and Miss Peele (violinist).

MARGATE.—The Philharmonic Society gave their first concert of the season in the New Pavilion on November 29. The programme included Tchaikovsky's Symphony 'Pathétique,' played for the first time in Thanet; the overtures 'Rosamunde' (Schubert), and 'Der Verkaufte Braut' (Smetana); and the 'Miniature suite' of Eric Coates, recently produced at Queen's Hall. Vocal items were contributed by Madame Gertrude Simpson. The president and hon. conductor of the Society is Dr. E. J. Bellerby; the principal violins, Mr. H. Victor Mitchell and Miss Eva Harvey; the honorary accompanist, Mr. Curzon M. Poole.

NEVIS (BRITISH WEST INDIES).—The small Philharmonic Society which, under Mr. A. M. Howell, is making a gallant effort to establish musical life in this district, gave two concerts during the year. The high standard aimed at is shown by the choice of a Suite by Dolmetsch and an Andantino by Lemare for the orchestra (composed of string players) to perform. We wish Mr. Howell success in the prosecution of his venture.

PAIGNTON.—The first two scenes from Coleridge-Taylor's 'Song of Hiawatha' were excellently sung on December 13 by the Choral Society, conducted by Mr. W. Layton. The singing did justice to the picturesque, melodious music, and both were highly appreciated. The solos were sung by Miss Mabel Todd, Mr. Walter Glynne, and Mr. Alfred J. Layton. The concert opened with Mozart's 'Magic flute' Overture.

PERTH (W. AUSTRALIA).—An excellent choice of choral music was made by the Musical Union for their concert on November 7. Adolf Jensen's cantata, 'The feast of Adonis,' was the principal work performed, and the choir and soloists vied with each other in giving an adequate interpretation. Other choral numbers were Elgar's 'It comes from the misty ages,' Dr. Harriss's' 'Chorus of Empire,' and the Bridal chorus from Cowen's 'The rose maiden.' Songs were given by Miss Minnie Waugh and Mr. Leslie Perlstein. Mr. H. H. Chandler was at the organ, and Mr. H. C. Hill conducted.

READING.—Dr. F. J. Read, who, to universal regret, has resigned the office of conductor to the Reading Philharmonic Society, and is carrying on the work until a successor is chosen, directed an excellent concert on December 6, when Dvorák's 'The spectre's bride,' and Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens' were performed. The two works run the whole gamut of choral expression, and present many types of executive difficulty, but the choir responded to every call. The solo work was ably done by Miss Agnes Christa, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Charles Tree.

TONYREFAIL.—On November 30, the Tonyrefail Male-Voice Party, assisted by an orchestra, performed Félicien David's symphonic ode, 'The desert,' with a success that reached the high-water mark of music in this district. To Mr. W. J. Lewis, who conducted, is due the credit for the high standard of the singing. The solo vocalists were Miss A. M. Jenkins, Mr. T. Thomas, and Mr. H. Bowen.

Windsor.—The Windsor and Eton Choral Society opened their season on December 8 with a concert at the Royal Albert Institute, under the direction of the Rev. Bernard Everett. Dr. Brewer's charming 'Summer Sports' and Sir C. Stanford's striking 'Songs of the Fleet' (with Mr. Plunket Greene as soloist) formed the first part of a well-chosen programme, in which the choir gave some highly attractive singing. Solo violoncello music was provided by Mr. Edward Mason.——On December 2, the Eton College Choir gave a concert in the same hall, under Dr. C. H. Lloyd's direction, and gave creditable readings of Elgar's 'The Reveille,' Morley's 'The nymphs in green,' and part-songs by Sullivan, Dunhill and Stanford. The soloists were Miss Alys Gear, Miss May Bartlett (violoncellist), and Master J. M. Nicholas (pianist).

Foreign Notes.

BARCELONA.

A Bach Festival, organized by 'L'Orfeo Catala,' was held here on November 19, 21, 26 and 28. On the last day the Mass in B minor was performed.

BERLIN.

The young American violinist, Eddy Brown, had a great success on his first appearance in Berlin. He played Mendelssohn's Concerto, and Dr. Kunwald conducted.—— At the sixth Loevensohn concert a new Pianoforte quintet by Philipp Scharwenka was produced. The work is highly spoken of.——The pianist, Richard Burmeister, has given a concert (with orchestra) of works by Liszt. The programme included the A major Concerto, and the pianist's own arrangement for pianoforte and orchestra of the 'Concerto pathétique.'——A highly-gifted pianist, a lady with the name of Cella della Vrancea, made an exceedingly favourable impression on her first appearance, which took place in the Hochschule, with the Blüthner Orchestra.——The Philharmonic Orchestra is to receive an annual subsidy of £3,000. Included in the contract are the following conditions:—(1) The Orchestra is to number at least seventy, of whom not more than fifteen may be absent on leave at one time. One month's leave is allowed annually to each member of the Orchestra. (2) From June till the end of September thirty-five concerts are to be given. In winter five concerts are to be given at reduced prices, and six special afternoon concerts for students, with free admission.——A composer who is attracting considerable attention, Karol Szymanowski, has recently produced a new Symphony (B flat major, Op. 19) and a Pianoforte sonata (A major, Op. 21) at the Philharmonic. Arthur Rubinstein played the Sonata brilliantly, and the Symphony was conducted by Gregor Fitelberg, a young conductor from Warsaw, of whom great things are expected. Both works are highly spoken of.——The pianist Fräulein Alice Ripper, who is rapidly making a name for herself, has given a successful recital, and announces her intention of visiting England during the summer season.——Winifred Purnell, a sixteen-year old pianist from Australia, who has recently given a recital here, is said by the Berlin critics to be an extraordinarily gifted artist, quite irrespective of her youth.——Louis Persinger, a young American violinist, pupil of Hans Becker in Leipsic, made an exceedingly favourable impression at his first recital here.

BERNE.

The production of the 'Rosenkavalier' was a great success. The first novelty of the opera season was Blech's 'Alpenkönig und Menschenfeind.' Other first performances promised are Charpentier's 'Louise,' Wolf-Ferrari's 'Susannen's Geheimnis,' and Liszt's 'Heilige Elisabeth.'

BREMEN.

On December 5 Richard Strauss conducted the first performance of the 'Rosenkavalier.'——The second Philharmonic concert was devoted to works by Liszt. The programme included the 13th Psalm, the E flat Pianoforte concerto (Emil Sauer), and the 'Faust' Symphony. The concert was conducted by Ernst Wendel.——A few days later Wendel repeated the 'Faust' Symphony at a concert of the Künstlerverein, and by way of comparison included in the same programme Wagner's 'Faust' Overture, and three orchestral movements from Berlioz's 'Faust.'

BRUSSELS.

Weber's 'Oberon' has been revived after twenty-five years at the Théâtre de la Monnaie.——The chief interest of the musical, and, more especially, the operatic season, has centred in the new conductor, Otto Lohse, who has proved a complete success.——At the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Saint-Saëns's new opera 'Déjanire' has been produced with great success.

BUDA-PESTH.

A new theatre, designed to seat 3,200 people, has been opened. Standard operas will be given at popular prices.—— Mahler's fourth Symphony has been performed here by the Wiener Tonkünstler Orchestra under Nedbal for the first time in Buda-Pesth, and made a great impression.

CARLSBAD.

Prince Joachim Albrecht of Prussia has written a new orchestral work entitled 'Toteninsel,' which will be produced by the Kur Orchestra. The work was inspired by Boecklin's picture of the same name.

CASSEL.

Elgar's Variations were recently played here under the direction of Prof. Dr. Beier, and met with great success.

CHICAGO.

The first performance in America of Sir Edward Elgar's Concerto for violin was given here on December 9 by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, with Mr. Albert Spalding as soloist. According to a correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, the work created a veritable sensation, and was pronounced by musicians to be the first great concerto by an Anglo-Saxon.

CINCINNATI.

The first American performance of Elgar's second Symphony took place here on November 24, under the direction of Herr Leopold Stokovski.

DESSAU.

The Singakademie, under the direction of Franz Mikorey, has given a performance of Liszt's 'Christus.'——The first performance in Dessau of 'Elektra' was given on December 10 in the presence of the composer.

DÜSSELDORF.

The second orchestral concert, conducted by Karl Panzner, consisted of works by Liszt. The programme included the 'Dante' Symphony and E flat Pianoforte concerto, played by Richard Singer, of Hamburg.

DRESDEN.

Adolph Adam's comic opera 'Si j'étais roi' has been revived at the Kgl. Hofopernhaus with great success.

FRANKFORT-ON-MAIN.

A new Pianoforte quintet by Fritz Volbach has been produced with great success by the Post Quartet, with the composer at the pianoforte.

GENEVA.

D'Albert's 'Tiefland' has been produced here with success. ——A Liszt orchestral concert has been given, under the direction of Bernhard Stavenhagen. The programme included the 'Dante' Symphony (for the first time in Geneva), the 137th Psalm, the 'Hunnenschlacht,' and the E flat Pianoforte concerto, played by Moriz Rosenthal.

LEIPSIC.

The Gewandhaus has devoted a second concert to works by Liszt. The programme of this concert (the sixth of the series) included 'Die Glocken des Strassburger Münsters,' the 13th Psalm, and 'Prometheus.'——The Riedel-Verein, under the conductorship of Dr. Georg Göhler, has also given a fine performance of Liszt's 'Christus.'——At the seventh Gewandhaus concert, Generalmusikdirektor von Schuch took the place of Professor Nikisch, who was absent in Russia.——A String quartet by Arnold Schönberg (Op. 4) was favourably received when performed by the Rebner Quartet.——Julius Bittner's opera, 'Der Musikant,' has met with great success.

MANNHEIM.

The Philharmonic Society is arranging a two days' Mahler Festival, which will take place early in the year. Mahler's fourth and eighth Symphonies, and his 'Lied von der Erde' will be performed, and Artur Bodanzky will conduct.

MONTE CARLO.

The coming operatic season promises to be of unusual interest. Massenet's 'Roma,' Stern and Nerini's 'L'épreuve' will be given their first performance, and the list includes 'Ivan le Terrible,' by the director, M. Raoul Gunsbourg, 'Boris Godounow,' 'The girl of the Golden West,' and 'Déianire.'

MUNICH.

A Society has been formed with the object of collecting funds to erect a 'Deutsches Symphoniehaus' in a central position in Germany. The authors of the movement are A. von Gleichen-Russwurm, Max Schillings, Ernest Haiger and Paul Marsop. The 'Symphony House' is intended to be a monument to Beethoven.

NAMUR.

Gabriel Dupont's opera 'La Glu' continues its triumphal progress. It was performed here at the end of November for the first time, under the conductorship of M. Close, and achieved a great success.

PARIS.

A special notice of the production of Saint-Saëns's opera 'Déjanire' will be found on p. 30.——At the Opéra-Comique, a new opera by Albéric Magnard, entitled 'Bérénice,' was produced with success on December 15.——On December 4, a youth of twelve, by name Charles Sommer, gave a violin recital. The Paris critics speak well of him, and anticipate that he will become a fine artist.

ROME.

As was anticipated, the production of 'Der Rosenkavalier' was the occasion of noisy scenes. The work has been provisionally withdrawn from the répertoire.

VIENNA.

The first performance of Eugen d'Albert's new opera, 'Die verschenkte Frau,' is to take place this month at the Hofoper.——Erich Korngold's latest work, a Pianoforte sonata (Cp. 2, No. 2), has been produced by Arthur Schnabel. It is acknowledged to be an important advance, though the Trio seems to have caused much disputation among the critics.——Wilhelm Kienzl's opera 'Der Kuhreigen,' recently produced here, has already been put down for performance at more than twenty opera houses.

ZÜRICH.

Siegmund von Hausegger's new Symphony for orchestra, organ and choir, was produced with great success on November 28 in the Tonhalle.

Miscellaneous.

At a special court of the Worshipful Company of Musicians, held on December 14 at 50, Lancaster Gate, the residence of the immediate Past-Master (Mr. Alfred Littleton), the Honorary Freedom of the Company was presented to Sir Edward Elgar, O.M., and the Company's medal was given to Dr. Charles Harriss. Both presentations were made by the Master, Mr. Arthur F. Hill, F.S.A. The occasion was made unique by the presence of ladies, viz., Lady Elgar, Mrs. Harriss, the Misses Littleton and Miss Mary Grafton (a niece of Sir Edward Elgar).

Mr. N. Gatty's opera, 'Duke or Devil,' a remarkably clever piece of musical characterization and an example of native composition that has yet to come into its own, was performed at the Crystal Palace on November 21 by the Moody-Manners Company, the original producers of the work.

Mr. Tobias Matthay delivered a new lecture, 'On the teaching of the fundamentals of technique,' to the Manchester Teachers' Association on November 28, and repeated it before the Brighton Branch of the London Music Teachers' Association on December 9.

A lecture on 'Carillons and bell music' was given by Mr. W. W. Starmer before the Literary and Philosophical Society, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on December 11. Examples were played by the lecturer upon a celesta.

Mr. Ernst Denhof has definitely decided to give a season of operatic performances between February 26 and April 6, and the répertoire will include 'The Flying Dutchman' and 'Orpheus.'

Mr. C. J. Bishenden continued his series of lectures on 'Old British composers and singers of their time' at 105, New Oxford Street, on December 7, when the subject was 'Dr. Arne.'

Mr. Montague Nathan lectured on 'Musical taste, discrimination and temperament,' on December 9, before a meeting of the Incorporated Society of Musicians at Leeds.

The London Sunday School Choir will hold its Spring Festival at the Albert Hall on February 12, and the great Crystal Palace Festival on June 12.

The next Handel Festival will take place at the Crystal Palace on June 22, 25, 27 and 29.

Answers to Correspondents.

L.F.—You claim to be a good pianoforte accompanist. We presume you can transpose at sight and generally follow the vagaries and virtuosities of singers and instrumental soloists. But even so it is difficult for us to suggest a field of employment. A large number of amateurs and concert-givers outside the highest class pay little or nothing to accompanists. The only course is to offer services whenever you can, and to hope to gain a reputation.

SIR GALAHAD.—For class-singing you will find Novello's School Sight-Singing Readers useful. They are published as follows: Book 226 (Staff Notation) and Books 154, 155 (Tonic Sol-fa); or Novello's School Songs. For help as to method of teaching Tonic Sol-fa and applying it to the Staff, consult the 'School Music Teacher,' published by Curwen & Sons, price 2*s.* 6*d.* You should take in The School Music Review, Novello & Co.).

HUMMING says he has derived vocal benefit from humming exercises, and asks why this is. We should say that it is because it induces the proper use of the nasal resonance chambers, and the habit of keeping the tone forward.

P. J. SOPHER.—The title of the opera is 'La Tosca,' not simply 'Tosca.'

Remarkable Work
ON
MUSIC EDUCATION.

Written by Famous Experts.

THAT Wonderful Book, the MUSICAL EDUCATOR, seems this season to be entering upon a new lease of life. As our readers know, its aim is to supply in interesting form a complete and systematic musical education.

We would especially draw attention to the following names of Leaders in the Musical World, and of the subjects for which they are responsible. The practical value of these sections will be apparent to all students and professors of music and singing.

MARK HAMBOURG,
"The Piano and how to Play it."
EDWIN H. LEMARE,
"The Art of Organ Playing."
MADAME MARCHESI,
"The Teaching of Singing."
JOHN DUNN,
"On Playing the Violin."
SIR F. H. COWEN,
"The Art of Conducting."

Course of Voice Training, Singing, and Solfeggio. Course on the Pianoforte. Course on the Violin. Positions illustrated by Diagrams and Photographs. Course on Harmonium, American Organ, and on the Organ. Lessons on Scientific Basis of Music. Lessons on Rudiments of Music. Course on Harmony and Counterpoint. Lessons in Canon and Fugue. Lessons in Musical Forms, Musical Analysis and Composition. Dictionary of Musical Terms. Articles on the Instruments used in the Orchestras and in Military Bands. History of Music. Biographical Dictionary of Musicians. Articles on Children's Music and Musical Drill. Articles on Choir Training and Conducting. Article on Congregational Music. Article on Musical Degrees and Education. Article on Nationality in Music.

Its Value to the Teacher.

In "The Musical Educator" every section is dealt with by an expert. Its value to the teacher of music is obvious, because it shows the way—at once simple and lucid—in which some of the greatest of musical professors would set about the instruction of a pupil anxious to perfect himself in his particular department, whether it be that of the piano, the violin, the harp, or any other instrument, or of any department of singing.

Add to this its all-round value as a standard work of reference on every point concerning the wide domain of music and musicians, and it will be granted that "The Musical Educator" is unique as well as complete.

TWO OPINIONS.

Sir J. FREDERICK BRIDGE.
"'The Musical Educator' is full of useful information plainly set forth. The musical illustrations are excellent."
Dr. CRESER, Mus.D. Oxon, F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L.
(Examiner in Music at Trinity College), writes :—
"We have here an illuminative work of great value, not only to the student, but also to the general reader. . . . It contains excellent instructions."

A PRACTICAL METHOD OF TRAINING CHORISTERS

BY

J. VARLEY ROBERTS.

Dr. Roberts brings to bear thirty years' experience. The Method is that adopted in the Magdalen College Choir.

"The foremost English authority on the subject."—The Guardian.
"Most valuable and eminently practical."—The Times.
"Accurately described as invaluable."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.
"Genuinely practical."—Manchester Guardian.
"Intensely practical."—Scottish Guardian.

To be had from Mr. HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press Warehouse, Amen Corner, E.C.; or NOVELLO & Co., Ltd., 160, Wardour Street, W.

MELODIOUS TECHNIQUE

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

COMPOSED BY

J. A. O'NEILL.

IN TWO BOOKS:
Price Two Shillings each, net.

These Pianoforte Studies have been highly praised by M. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN, who has expressed his intention of playing some of them during his Recital Tour in the United States. His testimonial is published with the Work, which consists of Twelve Numbers, specially designed to develop power and skill in the fourth and fifth fingers. The importance of trying to equalize these weaker fingers with the stronger ones is unquestionable, as defective execution is more often traceable to this inequality of the fingers than to any other cause.

IN THREE BOOKS.

Price each, Three Shillings net.

OVER 40,000 COPIES SOLD.

A FEW APPRECIATIONS.

I always use "Technic and Melody" for beginners, and think it is by far the finest work of its kind to be obtained.

Yours faithfully, EDIE MARR.

I am very much obliged for the Gurlitt "Technic and Melody." I consider this instructor one of the best and most practical books I have come across, and shall use it exclusively in future.

Yours faithfully, RUDOLF KING.

"Technic and Melody," by Gurlitt, is the best book for beginners I have ever handled, and the cheapest also. I use it all the time and recommend it whenever I have a chance.

Yours faithfully, SISTER IRENE.

"Gounod's 'Redemption' appeals to the public largely on account of the words with which the music is associated, and the same can certainly be said of 'The Messiah.' In each case the music, however, is undoubtedly a powerful factor, and the words being not only impressive, but also familiar, the listener is doubly affected. . . . Then, to speak only of Gounod's work, it is strong because it is sincere. A gifted composer, by thoughtful and deep study of the sacred story, can illustrate it in tones effectively, but more convincingly if in true sympathy with the subject—in other words, if he be religious, using that term in its widest sense. And Gounod, like Bach, and in modern times Liszt, was of a serious cast of mind, and possessor, moreover, of a strongly emotional nature."—Daily Telegraph, March 1, 1909.

"If allowances are made for the state of popular musical thought in his day, and for the undoubted sincerity with which Gounod adopted a style that suited his nature, it is possible to consider his 'Redemption' in many respects a work of high art. Melody in itself, if dissociated from unsuitable surroundings, will never fail to appeal, and broad choral effect, when secured by skilful methods, will always give pleasure. The audience that gathered on Saturday evening to hear the 'Redemption' performed by the Alexandra Palace Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill, showed by their number and their interested attention that the work still retains its hold."—Morning Post, March 1, 1909.

NEW LENT CANTATA

GETHSEMANE TO GOLGOTHA.

THE LIBRETTO BY YORKE CHESTER

is divided into Three Parts—

1. IN THE GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE. 2. BEFORE PILATE'S HOUSE.
3. AT THE FOOT OF THE CROSS:

These scenes being suggested by Montgomery's Hymn, the three verses of which, commencing "Go to dark Gethsemane," "Follow to the Judgment-Hall," and "Calvary's mournful mountain climb"—sung as a Chorale by the Choir—respectively commence the three parts of the Cantata, which will be found to be so pictorially and dramatically constructed as to enlist the attention and sympathies of both Choir and Congregation. Each part concludes with a short selection from the Litany to be said by the officiating Minister and the Congregation, together with a Hymn.

THE MUSIC BY EDMUND TURNER

Is one of the best examples of this composer's work, combining extreme effectiveness with a comparative absence of difficulties, so that time spent at rehearsals is always profitably employed and not wasted in overcoming tasks which are of no effect even when conquered.

S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

THE TIMES.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor has found a theme which suits him admirably in the poem by Mr. Alfred Noyes, for there is that mixture of high colouring and simple narrative in the words which finds a counterpart in the brilliant use of the orchestra added to simple melody which is the essence of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's music. The whole story is cleverly carried on by chorus, solo voices, and solo quartet woven together as contrasting elements of colour rather than dramatically.

The whole is full of melody, yet it never quite loses its distinction, and is carried through by its evident sincerity, its skilful technique (which is so skilful that the hearer does not notice it), and the fact that every detail bears the stamp of the composer's individual and unaffected style.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor in "A Tale of Old Japan" has written a very pretty setting of the poem by Alfred Noyes. It is another "Hiawatha." If Mr. Taylor had never written "Hiawatha," one might acclaim "A Tale of Old Japan" as an expression of a new personality in English music.

There is nothing academic in the music; it is simply written, there is practically no counterpoint, and its frankly melodious character, even in recitatives, will surely appeal greatly to provincial choirs of limited ability. It is a charming work of its kind, and will, no doubt, be immensely popular.

STANDARD.

The most striking work was Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's "A Tale of Old Japan."

The music is delicate and fragrant as the cherry blossoms of the land which inspired the poem. Its melodic outline and dainty scoring are full of charm.

The work is so picturesque and attractive that it appeals to the ear as well as to the æsthetic taste.

DAILY MAIL.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's cantata, "A Tale of Old Japan," won a frank success at its first performance at Queen's Hall last night. The composer has chosen a pretty and quaint and touching, but not too touching, ballad by Mr. Alfred Noyes, and has given it a musical setting which suggests a mosaic pattern in its bright colours and dainty themes.

DAILY NEWS.

It is pretty, simple music, full of colour and picturesqueness.

The scoring is clever and animated, and the whole composition made a good impression.

GLOBE.

It contains much very graceful and imaginative music, especially in the delightful chorus with solo quartet "Peonies, peonies crowned the May," which, in its way, is a little gem.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor has written a very dainty and attractive Cantata which ought to find great favour with choral societies.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

With the facile and effective choral writing, the neat rhythms and touches of colour suggesting something Japanese, "A Tale of Old Japan" may well be welcomed by the many choral societies in existence on the look-out for something new.

THE REFEREE.

The subject seems to have appealed with peculiar force to the composer, who has most happily realised the poetry and pathos of the libretto, and set it to music that flows on in spontaneous melody, enhanced by the art and craft of the accomplished musician. Human feeling pulsates in the music from the first to the last bar, and to listen to it is pure enjoyment.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The crowded hour of glorious life has come to Mr. Josef Holbrooke far earlier in his career than he, perhaps, had any right to expect, and certainly—we state it frankly—far earlier than we thought he would enjoy it, for last night, at the penultimate Promenade Concert in the Queen's Hall he achieved, by means of his first Symphony, "Les Hommages," something that can only be described as a popular triumph.

Where Mr. Holbrooke spoke for himself in the two middle movements, a charming Serenade and an Elegy of remarkable atmospheric beauty, he spoke as he has never spoken before, for here is the warmth of colour, and the refined delicacy of treatment. The finale, a brilliant piece of writing, largely fugal, in the tune of "Danse Russe," has without any doubt whatever raised its composer to a great height among his contemporaries. The Symphony was magnificently played under Sir Henry J. Wood, and there is no question whatever of its success.

DAILY MAIL.

Mr. Josef Holbrooke's symphony "Les Hommages"—first heard last night at the Promenade Concerts—is a brilliant and amazing work in four movements, dedicated respectively in Wagner, Mozart, Dvorák, and Tchaikovsky. It is an important addition to the literature of modern British music.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES
FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

THIS Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

* These Books contain Studies composed by Mr. Franklin Taylor specially for this Series.

FIFTY-SIX BOOKS, PRICE ONE SHILLING EACH.

FROM THE ABOVE:

SELECTED PIANOFORTE STUDIES

PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

IN TWO SETS (EIGHT BOOKS), PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE EACH BOOK.

THE present collection of Studies is designed to provide teachers with a short course of Pianoforte Technique adapted to the needs of the average pupil, the intention being to spare the teacher the labour of choosing a sufficiently varied selection from the large mass of material existing, and at the same time to ensure that the different departments of technique shall be undertaken in the order which experience has proved to be the most beneficial.

The Studies are grouped in two Sets, and are so arranged that the different Books in which they are contained may be taken in consecutive order, but pupils who are already further advanced than the elementary stage represented by Set I. may commence at once with Set II., which will be found to be complete in itself, and to illustrate all the essential elements of technique.

Where additional studies are desired, or studies on certain subjects which are not touched upon in this series, the larger collection, published under the title of "Progressive Studies" (from which the present examples have been selected), is of course available.

When Pupils say that my System has "worked wonders," has "completely transformed" their playing, that they can "see their technique grow," that their "vast" improvement "cannot be expressed in words," that it is "amazingly effective," "as necessary for the muscles as food is for the body," an "incalculable boon," "epoch-making," "a veritable treasure trove," "the best £3 3s. worth they have ever had," &c., and that the results of the course are "like a miracle," &c., the matter is clearly worth the consideration of every pianist.

During a recent Vacation Conference on

at a meeting for discussion held under the presidency of Dr. Arthur Somervell, a question was asked as to the

BEST WAY OF BECOMING A GOOD SIGHT-PLAYER

A lady member of the Conference rose and stated that she had been taking lessons in that she had already felt very great improvement as the result, and could warmly commend the System. An interesting conversation followed in which some of the principles of the System were explained.

EHREMAYER SYSTEM OF PIANOFORTE SIGHT-PLAYING,

 This is a matter in which all pianists and teachers should be interested. Mr. L. M. EHREMAYER gladly sends his booklet describing the System post-free on application to him at 27, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.*

"As each Advent season rolls round there is always struck a peculiar and a fascinating note of musical attraction in the person of one of the foremost local singers of the day. We refer to Mr. Fredericks, of Lichfield Cathedral. His is a record of which few can boast, and it says much for his artistic method of production, that, after so lengthy a service, he is still able to give the two great anthems of the season in a style which is well-nigh irreproachable. To hear Mr. Fredericks declaim 'The Sorrows of Death' from Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' is to hear an unforgettable effort. On Sunday afternoon his 'Watchman, will the night soon pass?' was delivered in consummate fashion."—South Staffordshire Times, December 22, 1911.

MR. CHARLES TREE.
Glasgow Times, December 18, 1911, says:—
"CHARLES TREE'S MANUAL OF SINGING.—That most versatile of vocalists, Mr. Charles Tree, has just entered the ranks of authorities on the art of singing. Few people, we dare say, will deny the right of one whose career has been so prosperous, to assume the rôle of preceptor of the art which he has successfully practised for many years. His book, 'How to Acquire Ease of Vocal Production,' differs in many respects from the hundred-and-one publications on the subject. Unlike these, it eschews technicalities where such may be avoided, the directions for teachers and students being set down in language that everyone can understand. He deals at the outset with correct placing of the vocal tones, to attain which most essential accomplishment he offers numerous and most helpful suggestions. Subsequently he gives hints on practice, enunciation, management of breath, health, temperament, facial expression, interpretation, &c., also exercises with illuminative notes as to how they should be practised."
Published by Joseph Williams, Limited, Great Portland Street, W.
'Elijah,' Chester, December 13, 1911. Chronicle says:—
"As to Mr. Tree's 'Elijah,' needless to say it was of the very first merit. The particular qualities of his singing were its pronounced dramatic power, and its fulness of tone. There was a strong suggestion of individuality about his renderings that doubled their impressiveness. Mr. Tree is a creative no less than an interpretative artist; his 'Elijah' was a Prince of God indeed. Without the shadow of exaggeration his rendering may be described as magnificent."

DR. ETHEL SMYTH.

Why is it that in the evolution of woman's capacities no great musical composer has appeared? Conflicting answers have been given to this question. Some endeavour to prove that the intellectual and physiological constitution of the sex is such that necessarily no woman can hope to place herself among the immortals in music. Others who review woman's high attainments in almost every other sphere of artistic activity aver that the conventional educational environment of the sex tends to stultify potential musical creativeness, and that when woman is completely emancipated she will emerge triumphant in every art.

In one of the volumes of the Proceedings of the Musical Association (ninth session, 1882-1883) the late Mr. Stephen S. Stratton gives a list of 390 women-composers. The dates range over the 18th and 19th centuries. Inasmuch as the list includes many names whose claims to recognition are frail, it is safe to estimate that by now a similarly generous catalogue would be tenfold larger. But when the merits of all the number are weighed it would be hard to name any who have achieved the distinction won by Dr. Ethel Smyth. On the Continent and even in her own country, she is recognised as a remarkable composer of virile and imaginative music. We are glad therefore to place before our readers an account of her career.

Ethel Mary Smyth was born in London on April 23, 1858. Her father was General J. H. Smyth, of the Royal Artillery. Her mother was a Miss Struth, who was a descendant of the family of Sir Edward Stracey, of Norfolk. Miss Smyth considers that her musical instincts were inherited from the Straceys, who had various gifts in this direction, whereas her father displayed no appreciation for the art. During her early youth Miss Smyth had no special inclination for musical study. She had conventional lessons from a German governess, and she was taught some rudimentary harmony by an amateur friend of the family, Colonel Ewing (the composer of 'Jerusalem the golden'), who gave her a copy of Berlioz's treatise on instrumentation. Apart from a perusal of this well-known and suggestive work, Miss Smyth has had no instruction in orchestration other than that derived from observation and private study. At the age of twelve she formed the idea that she would like to make a special study of music, but her father steadily opposed her desires. Notwithstanding this formidable, and at times distressing obstacle, the girl's wishes ultimately prevailed, and in 1877 she entered the Leipsic Conservatorium. She remained there for only a brief period, and afterwards studied composition under Heinrich von Herzogenberg, a distinguished musician who, with his wife, was intimately acquainted with Brahms. In the voluminous published correspondence that passed between Brahms and the Herzogenbergs, Miss Smyth is 'das Kind' occasionally mentioned. In 1882 Miss Smyth travelled in various parts of Europe, and for a time resided in Italy. Returning to Leipsic in 1884, she brought with her a Quintet for strings which was played at a Leipsic Gewandhaus Concert. A Sonata for pianoforte and violin was also brought forward at these concerts in 1887, the violin part being played by Adolph Brodsky.

Miss Smyth came to England in 1890. In that year a Serenade in D for orchestra, in four movements, was produced at the Crystal Palace on April 26, 1890, under August Manns, who was always generous in recognizing the claims of native art, and on October 18 of the same year he produced Miss Smyth's overture, 'Antony and Cleopatra.' This overture was also given in London in 1892 at one of Henschel's Symphony Concerts.

These important works established Miss Smyth's claim to a high place in contemporary art, and their performance paved the way to the acceptance of a composition of greater scope, namely, a Solemn Mass in D, which was produced at the Albert Hall, under Joseph Barnby, on January 18, 1893. The following criticism from the new edition of 'Grove's Dictionary' very well sums up the opinion then generally expressed:

> This work definitely placed the composer among the most eminent composers of her time, and easily at the head of all those of her own sex. The most striking thing about it was the entire absence of the qualities that are usually associated with feminine productions. Throughout it was virile, masterly in construction and workmanship, and particularly remarkable for the excellence and rich colouring of the orchestration.

It is to be regretted that this Mass has not, so far as we are aware, been performed again.*

Miss Smyth's next essay was a great swing of the pendulum in the matter of style and subject. Opera now stimulated her muse, and the first result was 'Fantasio,' a comic opera in two acts, the libretto of which, in German, was adapted from De Musset and written by Miss Smyth. This was produced at Weimar in 1898, and it was performed at Carlsruhe, under Mottl, in February, 1901. A one-act opera, 'Der Wald,' followed, and was produced at Berlin under Muck, in September, 1901, and afterwards elsewhere in Germany, always with success. The first performance in England was given at Covent Garden on July 18, 1902, and it enjoyed the distinction of another performance during the 1903 season. The first performance in America was given at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, in March, 1903.

Thus encouraged in some of the most important art centres of the world, Miss Smyth set to work on the most ambitious task of her musical life. This was the composition of the three-act opera 'Les Naufrageurs' (as 'Strandrecht' in German and 'The Wreckers' in English), the libretto of which was written by H. B. Brewster. When the score was brought before Nikisch, who was then director at Leipsic Opera House, he immediately ordered a contract to be signed for its early production. But unfortunately he shortly afterwards resigned the post, and the work was produced in November, 1906, under less sympathetic auspices. Extensive and unauthorised cuts were made, but although the presentation was so inadequate the work made a deep impression, and still further raised the composer's reputation. Other performances at the Opera House were at once projected, but Miss Smyth, having secured the copies of the music, bluntly declined to allow any further performances to be given, as a protest against what she considered to be a mutilation of her work. A fine performance of the opera was given at Prague on December 22, 1906. It was heard for the first time in England (and in English) at His Majesty's Theatre (the 'Afternoon Theatre' series) on June 22, 1909, and at Covent Garden on March 1, 1910, on both occasions under Mr. Thomas Beecham. Although some critics suggested condensation of the music and a quickening of the action, praise of the conception and beauty of the work was practically unanimous. The Grove article on the composer, from which we have already quoted, says of the opera:

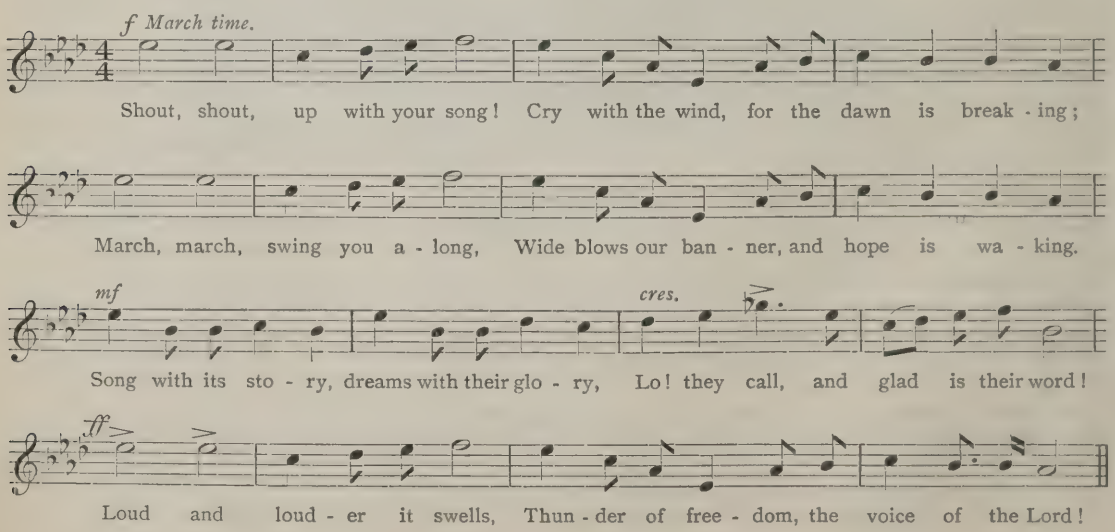
> While the style is so far modern as that set pieces are dispensed with, Wagner's artistic ideals are fulfilled, there is no attempt to curry favour with the lovers of ugly music, or to write what sounds bizarre for the sake of making a sensation. The fine treatment of the choruses in the first act, the orchestral introduction to the second act, and in the same section the great love-duet which rises in intensity of emotion with the rising of the beacon-flame lit by the lovers to warn ships from the dangers of the coast; and in the third act the whole treatment of the final situation, in which the lovers are left by the people to be drowned by the advancing tide—all these points are among the most remarkable things in modern opera, and it is difficult to point to a work of any nationality since Wagner that has a more direct appeal to the emotions, or that is more skilfully planned and carried out.

'The Wreckers' will be performed at Vienna Opera House this spring under Herr Walther, who is determined to make the work a success.

Some songs for mezzo-soprano and a small orchestra, written to French words, were produced with success at the Queen's Hall on November 12, 1907. The latest compositions include two mixed-voice choruses with accompaniment for orchestra, 'Sleepless dreams' (words by D. G. Rossetti) and 'Hey nonny no' (words from a Christchurch MS., 16th century). These were produced by the London Choral Society in 1910. They are to be performed with German words at the Sing-akademie, Vienna, in March. Other new pieces are four songs for mezzo-soprano or baritone, with accompaniment for orchestra (an arrangement for pianoforte is also published). These are as follows: 'Odelette,' 'The Dance,' 'Chrysilla,' and 'Anacreontic Ode.' The words of the first three are by H. de Régnier, and of the last the French version is by Leconte de Lisle. English words are also provided. The idiom of these compositions is very original and beautiful.

Miss Smyth is an ardent advocate of female suffrage. She belongs to the extreme militant wing of the party, and like many of her sex she is prepared to obey implicitly the instructions of her leaders: 'her 's not to reason why, her 's but to do or die.' The 'cause' has inspired some of her most recent music, a selection from which was brought forward at a concert organized by Miss Smyth, and given under her baton at Queen's Hall on April 1, 1911. The choral songs performed on this occasion are entitled, 'Songs of Sunrise': (a) 'Laggard dawn,' for unaccompanied female voices; (b) '1910,' for mixed voices and orchestra; (c) 'The march of the women,' for mixed voices and orchestra. The last-named piece is known by the cult all over the country, and is apparently the 'Marseillaise' of the cause. Its melody has all the elements that go to make a popular tune designed for massed singing. We are glad to give the tune here, with one of the four verses of the lyric:



f March time.
Shout, shout, up with your song! Cry with the wind, for the dawn is break - ing;
March, march, swing you a - long, Wide blows our ban - ner, and hope is wa - king.
mf
cres.
Song with its sto - ry, dreams with their glo - ry, Lo! they call, and glad is their word!
ff
Loud and loud - er it swells, Thun - der of free - dom, the voice of the Lord!

As the trend of Miss Smyth's inspiration is in the direction of opera, her views on the immediate situation as regards the prospects of opera in this country are as interesting as they are forceful. She thinks that opera in England has very little chance for years to come. The current criticisms passed upon Mr. Beecham's and Mr. Hammerstein's efforts are in her opinion justifiable. She says: 'You get a first-rate orchestra, good principals, new scenery painted, regardless of expense. But all these things are of little or no value artistically, compared with the creation of an adequate ensemble. One might as well hope to improvise a regiment that can manœuvre perfectly and be fit for war emergencies as to run an opera in practically no time. The Covent Garden Syndicate justly claims that it manages the only opera house in Europe that pays its way without a subsidy; but it is able to achieve this mainly because it is a fashionable social gathering and entertainment, at which many people think more of meeting their friends and of displaying their diamonds than of the quality of the music and its artistic performance. The general production is often excellent, because great singers are engaged and it is thought worth while to spend trouble over favourite works. But when a new opera, or one which is not likely to be a special attraction to the clientèle, is proposed, the risk of failure to please the public is a governing factor in the decision.' Therefore Miss Smyth finds that the Covent Garden opera is not a progressive institution. The Continental opera houses are subsidised, because the public really cares about opera and demands novelties. Time and money therefore can and must be risked. Miss Smyth adds:

> Whether the English public has a potential taste for opera or not we do not know. The food is too badly cooked, and those who are asked to eat it show no signs of appetite. There is not an audience abroad that has not a rough idea of whether a performance is good, bad, or indifferent; one can say that as regards English opera the English public has not the faintest critical sense in this matter. One cannot even judge the points of a cricket or football match unless one happens to know the game, and I am afraid I do not see how, in London at least—where people are always on the look-out for a new sensation, and where the same people who run to see 'Elektra' would, as Mr. Beecham remarked, run with still more zeal to see an elephant standing on one foot on the top of the Nelson Column,—a critical taste for operatic art is to be grown. For myself, I have declined two recent offers to produce 'The Wreckers' in England, being perfectly certain that it is a waste of time and money. But on the other hand it will be produced at Vienna next spring, and so certain am I of its being treated as a work of art should be treated—that is, for the time being absorbing all the talent and energy which that Opera House commands to produce a performance as near perfection as possible,—that I shall not even preside at the rehearsals. These people know better than I how to do the best by my work. Under present circumstances I cannot conceive of ever writing an opera in English again. I would rather 'do time' than endeavour to get it properly produced. You cannot make bricks without straw.

Miss Smyth thinks that English voices are extremely beautiful, and the ensembles in some of Mr. Beecham's productions seemed to her as bare sound some of the most beautiful she had ever heard. But what use is all this if the singers have not the most elementary knowledge of acting and of expressing the drama which the music contains in their action and phrasing? This is born of a tradition which, whether from the domination of the oratorio or for some other reason, the English have hitherto had absolutely no chance of acquiring. Even the question of light, varied according to the dramatic intentions of the composer, is not thought out, and yet it is quite as important a matter as the colour of the instrumentation. Who, asks Miss Smyth, has the remotest idea of this being an essential part of the whole? The impression of well-trained operatic judges as regards performances seen in England and thought quite excellent here, is that it is as the work of children, from sheer ignorance of these essentials to the operatic art. She sums up her views by declaring that 'Opera is in itself a civilization, and that civilization in England is lacking.'

Miss Smyth was granted the degree of Doctor of Music, honoris causâ, by Durham University in June, 1910.

OPERA IN ENGLAND.*

This is a very remarkable book, and a valuable contribution to the rather scanty literature of the subject. So much may at once be said, and Mr. Forsyth is such a first-rate advocate that he comes very near to convert us to the explanation he has to offer for the admitted fact that English opera in the strict sense of the term can hardly be said to exist as a living, national art-form. The explanation referred to is that those nations which have sought and fought for 'world-power' are debarred by the possession of that power from excelling in music and more particularly in opera. To 'exteriorize' and 'interiorize' are terms constantly used in the book, and explained to mean, in the first case, the mental habit which leads a nation to colonise, to conquer, and to enlarge its borders generally, and in the second case the tendency to contemplate its own achievements, and to rest contented in the enjoyment of its own products, artistic and otherwise. A conspectus of history is given which proves, to the satisfaction of the author, that 'as soon as a nation begins to extend and exteriorize itself, it ceases to develop its musical, though not necessarily its other artistic, faculties.' To discuss this thesis in regard to the other nations would occupy too much space in this review, but I may point out that a great difficulty stands in its way for English history, viz., the period when England was undoubtedly the supremely musical country—the days of the Elizabethan madrigalists—was also the period of quite remarkable 'exteriorization.' This difficulty is frankly stated by Mr. Forsyth, though not quite satisfactorily met. But if we grant that as a general rule the 'exteriorizing' countries are not as musical as the 'interiorizing,' I cannot help wondering in what way Mr. Forsyth would have us guide our steps towards the realization of a national music and a national opera; for even the most advanced 'little Englander' can hardly suppose that if his countrymen became a nation of self-contemplators, like the Omphaloseboi of ancient days, we should eventually, from that cause alone, develop a national operatic style. The political aspect of the case seems to me, I must admit, a little forced; but the constructive part of Mr. Forsyth's scheme is intensely interesting and on the whole well thought out. He has remarkable skill as a writer, and often puts his points in a way that is both brilliant and convincing. He is altogether opposed to the idea that our composers shall venture upon what is called 'grand opera,' for he considers that this must always be imitated from one or other of the prevailing Continental styles; he takes courage for the future from the success of a lighter form of operatic enterprise, the success of the 'ballad operas' of the past and of the Savoy operas more recently, and thinks that a national style may be attained by experimenting with works of the opéra-comique type. It is curious that so well-read a musician should have omitted to quote in support of his theory the strongly expressed opinion of Brahms, who held that the best type of opera was that which included spoken dialogue. In assuming this form of opera to be in any way characteristic of England, Mr. Forsyth is surely going a little too far; the German Singspiel, the older French opéra-comique, are thoroughly characteristic, each of its own nation, yet the essential part of their form is virtually identical with that of the lighter English operas. Modern Continental works in this form, like the 'Fledermaus' and the 'Contes d'Hoffmann,' are surely not to be condemned as providing a bad example for English composers! The root of the matter lies really a good deal deeper than this. Whether we allow spoken dialogue or recitative, we must employ the musical idioms that are characteristic of English music, and there are, in truth, few enough of the composers who have learned to do this. When we get a happy combination of a clever librettist, an original composer, and an enterprising, patriotic and patient manager, it is extremely likely that the public will be attracted to native opera once more.

* 'Music and Nationalism; a study of English Opera.' By Cecil Forsyth. (Macmillan & Co., Ltd.)

The absurd idea that English is a bad language to sing in is of course easily disproved by the success of countless oratorios, and, in another sphere of art, in every performance of 'musical comedy' that takes place in London. The public cannot be expected to go where they will be bored, just because the tiresome work is written and composed by Englishmen; patriotism cannot go as far as that. But of course there are whole classes of people—their characters and aims are very sharply outlined by Mr. Forsyth—whose interest it is to foster the notion that the fashionable world will be bored by an opera in English, and it often seems as though manager, composer, performer and the public were all in league together to keep back the cause of national opera. The alleged causes of the acknowledged failure have gone round and round in a vicious circle. The composer will not write things which stand only the very smallest chance of production and upon whose presentation no sane manager would spend an adequate sum; the public will not come to a thing inadequately presented; and as the chief singers of opera are seldom engaged for these experimental performances, the whole thing is foredoomed to failure. But in the story of the old woman stopped at the stile, as soon as one obstacle in the long series was removed the whole opposition faded away. And already one breach has been made in the circle of objections, for our young singers have at last conquered the prejudices of the public and it is no longer necessary or profitable for them to style themselves 'Signor,' 'Mademoiselle,' or 'Herr.' They are accepted on their merits, and it has been demonstrated over and over again that they can both act and sing perhaps as well as the performers of any other nation. Already the average education and taste of the race of English singers have so vastly improved, that really vulgar pronunciation of English is now the exception, and it is unlikely that in any future revivals of 'The Bohemian Girl' Devilshoof's soliloquy will be diversified by his drinking out of the ink-bottle and obliging the audience by singing Schumann's 'Two Grenadiers' with a cheerful ending. The tradition started at the Savoy Theatre, and happily maintained on the 'musical comedy' stage, of distinct aud refined enunciation, is at work all through the profession, and if these young people are only provided with words that make sense, tell a story without affectation, and suggest to the composer suitable rhythms, we shall soon get work that will be fit for production.

It will of course be easy for any manager with unlimited capital to go on for as long as is necessary doing what Mr. Beecham began to do for a season or two, and make a repertory of the various works that have appeared sporadically at different times, works written to English librettos by composers of distinction; and in process of time the public would answer to the call, but they must answer it, not from any feeling of patriotism, but from feeling that they must not miss an important English production any more than they would miss a good and interesting play. If opera could be put on a level with non-musical drama, nothing further could be desired. The fact that most plays in London take place in the English language does not prevent the occasional performance of foreign masterpieces, old and new, in the original tongues; nor does any section of the English theatrical world suffer in consequence. If only the normal language for opera in England were English, there could be no objection to the occasional production of operas in whatever foreign tongue might suit the taste of the public or the convenience of the manager. It is difficult to endorse Mr. Forsyth's sentence, 'I do not hesitate to say that every man, English or otherwise, if he fully realise his nationality, shall find—must find—in every foreign art-work something in some part repellent to his own individuality.' The excess of Chauvinism which they suggest is in truth far enough from us in England to-day; but if it were realised, the operatic state of the country would assuredly be even less satisfactory than it is now. Mr. Forsyth implies that in his ideal national opera the great classical operas of the past are to be ignored by students and the public altogether. 'Orfeo,' 'Don Giovanni,' 'Fidelio,' would all be banished together if the author's principles were pushed to their logical end. Operatic reform must be based on a recognition of the undoubted masterpieces, at least those of classical beauty like the works named. Nor could any opera institution, however insular in intention, venture to exclude them in the interests of national art. These and some few others have long ceased to be national; they belong to the world, not to any one country.

Some of the many points the author makes show remarkable insight; and whatever we think of his main theory, there is no denying the cleverness of his reference to 'the curiously balanced and seemingly chronic state of mental exteriorization combined with physical interiorization in France which has made her the most unsuccessful colonizer in the world, and has enabled her to maintain a continuous school of music always characteristically French, but often the work of foreigners.' In another place Mr. Forsyth gives us the much-needed reminder that 'the pernicious cult of the foreigner . . . makes London the (very profitable) laughing-stock of Europe.' On the difficulties which beset the English composer in connection with getting a hearing for his work, on the absurdities of operatic libretti and translation, and on all sorts of other topics, the writer has much to say, and says it extremely well, so that the book cannot fail to amuse even those who will differ most completely from its conclusions.

THE MUSICAL VALUE OF CHURCH ORGAN RECITALS.

By W. G. Alcock.

One of the first considerations of the young organist upon his appointment to a church, turns upon the opportunities his position may offer for the giving of organ recitals. The enthusiasm kindled by his teacher and by his private study demands an outlet, and this is too seldom found in the actual services of the Church. Simplicity, and a consideration of the musical possibilities of the congregation, are more and more frequently insisted upon by the clergy, and the monthly anthem or an occasional setting of the Canticles afford but meagre scope for the skill of trained musicians who would express their conception of great truths in the loftiest manner. The organ recital, then, to some extent meets this desire for the expansion of musical thought. The place, the instrument, the skill of the player, and the music, should undoubtedly produce as a result one not only of musical value, but of real rest and refreshment to the listener. It is to be feared that the tendency is too frequently that of personal consideration, and a desire for 'making a name' on the part of the organist. This need give no offence, for the ambition is not confined to organists, and may be a perfectly laudable one for any instrumental or vocal soloist. The close connection between an organist and his church places him, however, in a somewhat different position, but one also which should strengthen him in his attitude towards all things artistic. If truth be the great thought underlying the teaching of the Church, it should also surely be the motive of all effort on the part of one holding the high office of chief musician. The real artist is true to his art, and in any walk in professional life the charlatan is at once appraised at his real value. It may be possible that the attitude of so many musical people towards the organ recital owes its lack of sympathy to the unworthy things for which the organ-loft is at times responsible.

The organ no doubt is an instrument which offers great temptation by reason of the extraordinary variety of tone and power so easily controlled by anyone of even limited technical skill. The application of pneumatic and electric action, and the variety of the tonal scheme, may well dazzle the least emotional by the immense possibilities they offer. In choosing the items of his programme, an organist might quite naturally desire to please his audience, without pausing to think that in doing so he may be, if not actually degrading his art, at least losing an opportunity of raising the ideals of some of his hearers. That he may have to bear criticism is quite probable, but let him be assured that he must in the end be successful, and that he will make a name—not necessarily on account of his brilliant execution, but for the ennobling influence commanded by his insistence on high ideals. He must remember that his audience will include some at least whose conception of music is low indeed, but also that there will generally be found those to whom his message will appeal. The following conversation was actually overheard recently after an organ recital (one of a series by different organists), the speaker being evidently a domestic servant. It should be stated that on a previous occasion a programme of really fine organ music had been worthily presented by a player of repute, and that the recital under notice was remarkable for realistic effects on the Choir piccolo, &c.! 'I like this man's playing. He's much better than —— He's too solemn.' It may be doubted whether it is worth while to attempt cultivation in such a soil as this. One feels that 'such as will not believe, shall not be able to exalt themselves.' It is to be feared that so long as unworthy music is offered to the multitude, so long will they be content with a low standard. To leave for a moment the church organist, though we are rapidly becoming a musical nation, the hero who would present to the audience at an Albert Hall Sunday Concert the Sonata in D minor by J. S. Bach, would certainly impose a difficult test, but one that, if the musical promise of our country come to maturity, may yet be attempted with confidence. At all events, it may be hoped that we have improved since the days of the Health Exhibition in that same hall, when an organ recital was embellished by a performance of the 'Lost Chord'! and furthermore, to ensure a double realism, the solo part was played upon the Tuba. Thus was the cornet solo arrangement re-arranged!

The chief obstacle to true organ music is undoubtedly the presentation, in terms of the organ, of music written for other instruments, and even for voices. We must perhaps have the 'Transcription,' and also it must be admitted that some pieces 'come off' better on the organ than through the medium intended by the composer. But this will not justify the neglect of the really great répertoire which is the birthright of the organ. An example of the variety possible was given by Sir Walter Parratt in his recital in Westminster Abbey, at the re-opening of the organ there. Each item was written for the organ, and composers of many countries were represented. It may safely be said that the impression on the audience was deep and lasting.

It may possibly be urged that the modern organ, when of large size, possesses stops of varying character which would never be used except in transcriptions. But even in such an instrument, the foundation will consist of Diapasons, Flutes, and Reeds, to which the 'fancy' stops should be merely adjuncts. The latter indeed are but varieties of the former. It is only necessary to point out that the works of Bach, Mendelssohn, Rheinberger, &c., are possible on any organ, great or small, to convince all but the confirmed charlatan that the instrument is still worthy the attention bestowed upon it by those masters. It is remarkable that through all the complexity of Max Reger and Karg-Elert the true genius of the organ shines more brightly than ever, and that these composers have both employed the old form of the Choral Prelude as the vehicle for some of their finest thoughts. If we are on the eve of a great development, it must surely be on such lines as we see there laid down.

The programme of any organ recital should consist, for the most part, of music written for the instrument (and of that only the most worthy), and arrangements should be confined to those which are least likely to rob the organ of its characteristic dignity. It is no doubt 'possible' to give a performance of the 'Tannhäuser' overture or of that of the 'Meistersinger,' but it will generally be found that the impression left is one of astonishment at the skill of the player, only to be surpassed by his doing the same thing the while standing on his head. The question of fitness apart, it is no doubt a wonderful feat to play these and similar works on the organ, but the whole matter turns upon the motive underlying such efforts. It were surely far more worthy to encourage a true artistic sense, even at the risk of a smaller audience? People will flock to see an acrobat or an aeroplanist, and it is to be feared many will go to hear an organist with a reputation, not so much to benefit by the music he plays as to speculate upon how on earth he plays it. If his object be to gain credit for a marvellous performance, he is entitled to much; but the man who respects himself and his instrument undoubtedly gains more, and that of greater value. He certainly does most towards the fostering of good musical taste. These opinions may no doubt provoke a smile here and there, but they are the result of much and varied experience and of searchings of heart. They are offered in all sincerity to those who are looking to the organ as a means of expressing lofty and ennobling thought, not only of works already written, but of those which shall yet be inspired by that glorious instrument.

A FRENCH BIOGRAPHY OF BIZET.*

M. Henry Gauthier-Villars is one of our most pugnacious writers on music, and certainly one whose influence during the past twenty years has been great. When the history of the evolution of the musical taste in France since 1890 comes to be written, it will be found impossible to overlook the series of his clever 'Lettres de l'Ouvreuse,' whose humorous form has helped to make comprehensible and palatable to the general public many a truth and many an argument in favour of the best musicians. He has now written a book on Bizet—a book that was wanting, and is the first to redress certain current opinions which have long been allowed to pass uncontradicted, as nobody took the trouble to investigate their value.

'"Carmen,"' says the author, 'is perhaps the only production of human art that no one discusses. Its supporters admit no restrictions to their praise, and followers of other ideals appear never to have troubled themselves with offering to the admirers of Bizet any of the objections that they are so liberal of in other cases.' This might even be extended to the whole of Bizet's works. Except mere journalistic articles, panegyrical or vituperative, a couple or so of volumes, and half-a-dozen chapters in books like M. Adolphe Jullien's 'Musiciens d'aujourd'hui' or the late Hughes Imbert's 'Medaillons contemporains,' hardly anything has been written on the composer, notwithstanding his popularity. A feeling that he had been misunderstood, and that posthumous justice was due to him, still prevails. Of course, Nietzsche's dithyrambs in favour of 'Carmen'—'a perfect work, the gaya scienza, in listening to which one becomes perfect, which does away with fog and hysteria and Senta-sentimentality'—have extensively helped to advertise it. Also Tchaikovsky—who, though nothing loth to court Balakirev's advice and to follow it, disliked the modern Russian musicians and never missed an occasion of taking up the cudgels against them—used to proclaim that 'Carmen,' which he opposed to 'the new Russian school's productions,' was the greatest work of its time.

How long the legend of a progressively-minded and sincerely creative Bizet, of a misunderstood revolutionary genius, would have obtained but for the recent publication of the composer's correspondence is difficult to say. But this publication has betrayed the true state of the case, by showing him to have been not the earnest and scrupulous innovator depicted by sentimental biographers and critics, but a shrewd matter-of-fact writer of music to suit the taste of directors and of the public. Of course, this has nothing to do with the intrinsic qualities of his music; but nevertheless it suggests the propriety of a closer critical examination. If it appears clearly that a certain artist's chief ideal was to court the general favour, it becomes more than likely that in his output will be found certain tokens of this weakness, certain characteristic flaws. Both these points—Bizet's deliberate attendance on the directors and public, and the resulting eclecticism of his methods—M. Gauthier-Villars, after remarking that 'Bizet's mentality consists of so strangely contradictory traits that any attempt at analysis will resemble a betrayal,' emphasizes as well by critical remarks as by quotations from Bizet's letters.

Bizet, the son of a professional musician, methodically trained and coached, an expert craftsman and the crack candidate to degrees and prizes, is, says the author, the professional par excellence. This fact must be well understood, as it accounts better than any other for his idiosyncrasies as a musician. He was the 'model pupil,' demure, dispassionate, who never rebelled against the surrounding routine nor chafed under the rules, as young artists of imaginative genius are wont to do. His favourite masters were 'Auber, Halévy, Gounod and Ambroise Thomas.' He could speak in one breath, and with equal positiveness, of Beethoven and of Meyerbeer's 'overwhelming genius.' He worked methodically, without incertitude and without enthusiasm. His plodding industry did not fail to receive the desired reward, the directors and the public proving willing enough to patronize him. He never wrote music but to order, librettos being found for him and always accepted by him without the slightest discussion or misgiving; and he knew that any work of his would be performed as soon as ready.

When he returned from Rome, at the age of twenty-four, he found two theatres open to him. Accordingly, he soon began to show himself fastidious, even withdrawing from the Opéra-Comique a score 'which would have afforded him too humble a début.' Later, when he undertakes to set to music a 'Cid' by Louis Gallet, he writes, unabashed: 'I have composed this summer a Cid in five acts. Faurè has launched me on this business; and if he is pleased with my work, I may hope to attain the great shop' (viz., the Théâtre de l'Opéra). Thus he used to 'keep his eye open'; and whenever he thought that a subject might prove tempting for a director, he would jump at it, unhesitatingly discarding it when he found himself mistaken.

'When he wrote,' says M. Gauthier-Villars, 'it was not in order to compass some artistic purpose of his own, nor to satisfy himself, but merely in order to be played.' He was so anxious to please, that after the first performance of his 'Fair maid of Perth' the critics rebuked him for too openly cajoling the public's taste. And even when a composer whom he admired, like Verdi (whose 'Trovatore' he had warmly commended in an article where, to the objection that it included much vulgar music, he asked whether 'Homer, Michael Angelo, Dante, Shakespeare, and Cervantes' were always 'distinguished'), seems inclined to move off the beaten track, he would instantly disavow him: 'Verdi,' he wrote, 'after "Don Carlos," is no longer Italian. He wants to write Wagner music. This score has neither head nor tail. He has made an attempt at style, and achieved but pretentiousness.'

This quotation contrasts strikingly with the well-known fact that more than once Bizet has been branded by contemporary critics as a follower of Wagner. But it should not be forgotten that in France, during the 'sixties and 'seventies, the very name of Wagner meant terror and dismay, because it summed up all that in music was modern, dangerous and loathsome. Whenever a French composer, Lalo or Bizet, Gounod or M. Saint-Saëns, risked any novel effect of harmony or orchestration, sentence of 'Wagnerism' was passed on him, as it had been passed on Verdi by Bizet himself. Posterity has amply atoned for these mistakes and others.

This faithful portrayal of Bizet, founded on his letters, which so well reveal 'the smallness of his soul and the imperfections of his sensibility,' is very different from the current idealizations. It finds a natural counterpart in the chapters devoted to Bizet's music, to the merits of which M. Gauthier-Villars—who has adopted a sound introspective method—does full justice without overshooting the mark. This will appear from the following digest of his conclusions:

'There is no ground whatever for trying to find in "Carmen," as some writers systematically do in spite of Bizet himself, the work of a prophet—a work heralding new ideals in art. Certainly Bizet has shocked his contemporaries by delightful, elusive harmonic effects, daring modulations and local colour; but he never dreamt of betraying the directors' trust by striking untrodden paths . . . An admirably gifted musician, he did his best to embellish with clever music such librettos as were entrusted to him; he intermingled skilfully-doled-out concessions and bold strokes. His sense of proportion and perspicuity render him remarkably representative of the Latin mind.'

M. Gauthier-Villars's book will, I believe, prove unwelcome to many of those who have adopted towards Bizet the attitude of blind worship, but welcome to many others who are fonder of truth than of Plato himself. It is strictly impartial, and even written in a spirit of sympathy, although some of the facts that it contains, or of the judgments asserted in its course, are not as pleasant as Bizet's admirers might wish.

Occasional Notes.

In our Competition Festival Record supplement we give full particulars of an international musical competition for choirs and bands to be held at Paris at Whitsuntide, May 26, 27 and 28. This event, which promises to be one of the most important of its kind ever held, is organized by the Town Council of Paris, and is under the patronage of the French Government. Already a great number of Continental musical Societies have announced their intention to enter. British choirs and bands will be afforded a special welcome owing to the existing warmth of the Entente Cordiale. The civic authorities and all the best-known French musicians are interesting themselves in the gathering. The prizes offered are exceptionally large in amount, and number. An invitation to a thousand British school children to attend and become the guests of the children of Paris is an attractive feature of the scheme. It should be noted particularly that on the third day (Tuesday, May 28) choral societies who sing simply for honour and not for ordinary prizes or in competition are specially invited. In the interests of British music it is very much to be hoped that our choral organizations will be thoroughly well represented. Our choral reputation stands high, and it is important that our Continental friends should confirm it on this unique occasion.

The Birmingham Musical Festival is one of the oldest of its kind, and the Festival Choir has seldom failed to maintain a high reputation, which has recently become much enhanced. It is therefore with great interest and pleasure that Londoners will receive the announcement that the Festival Choir is to visit the Metropolis for the first time this month. The occasion will be the concert of the London Symphony Orchestra on February 29, when Bach's Mass in B minor will be performed under the direction of Dr. Sinclair, with Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Gervase Elwes and Mr. J. Campbell McInnes as soloists, and Mr. C. W. Perkins as organist.

Various methods of inducement, varying chiefly in their degree of dulness, are employed in England to bring choralists to rehearsal. For a really sparkling and enticing official notification one must, of course, look to America. The latest to hand reads as follows :

Dear Chorus:

HALLELUJAH ! We have established a new "best" performance of the Messiah, which gave me as well as the audience unalloyed pleasure. We will talk it all over at the next rehearsal, which is MONDAY, JANUARY 8, AT 8 O'CLOCK SHARP, at Y. M. C. A. Hall. Our next concert will be February 15, so regularity in attendance is obviously necessary. No matter how cold the weather, we will have a warm rehearsal. Extra rehearsals for the women on Wednesday, January 10 and 17, at 4.30 p. m., in Y. M. C. A. Hall. Also important. Wishing you a H. N. Y. and m. o. t. Yours gratefully, Cannot this example be followed in England? Sir Frederick Bridge has a reputation for sly humour.

The dates of the annual Mozart-Wagner Festival at Munich, which continually develops in importance and attractiveness, and promises to overshadow Bayreuth, have been announced. 'The Marriage of Figaro' will be given on August 2 and 8 ; 'Così fan tutte' on August 3 and 10; 'Don Giovanni' on August 5 and 9 ; 'Bastien and Bastienne' and 'Il Seraglio' on August 6. The Wagner performances will be given in four series, each of which will consist of 'The Mastersingers' (August 11 and 24, September 4 and 15), 'Tristan und Isolde' (August 13 and 22, September 2 and 13), and 'The Ring' (August 15-20 and 26-31, and September 6-11). This last cycle of 'The Ring' will presumably form part of two series.

The subject of national opera and opera in English is as regularly periodic as that of record gooseberries. It merely recurs at longer intervals. The turmoil of discussion that is now setting so many tongues and pens in motion round the hopes of Mr. Hammerstein and the failures of Mr. Beecham is only a recrudescence. It is difficult to say anything on the subject that has not been said before. Some keen intellects, however, are now at work. Mr. Cecil Forsyth, whose book is reviewed on p. 83 of this issue, has laid out therein an interesting and novel theory of the connection between our failure in opera and our 'exteriorising' tendencies as a nation. There is less novelty in the opinion, to which Mr. Hammerstein has at length confessed, that opera cannot be carried on in England without philanthropy, in the form of either subscriptions or subsidy. It is the subscription list that keeps Covent Garden alive, although the motive behind it is nothing more philanthropic than social necessity. Yet Mr. Neil Forsyth, in his recent speech to the Old Neuenheimers' Society, could point out with pardonable pride that Covent Garden was practically the only important Opera House in Europe that was self-supporting. He said :

The financial results of our enterprise are never published, but I am betraying no secret when I say that, under the present régime, Covent Garden is practically the only Opera House in Europe that pays its way unaided and unsubsidised. In Paris the societies that run the Opéra and the Opéra-Comique not only have the use of their fine theatres gratis, and are exempt from taxation, but receive subsidies of £32,000 and £16,000 respectively. In Berlin, Vienna, St. Petersburg, Dresden, Munich, and the other principal cities of Germany, no rent or taxes are paid in respect of the Opera House, but the Court pays the annual deficits, for there always are deficits ; in the two cases first mentioned they are said to amount to between £29,000 and £30,000 annually. The Scala at Milan has for years been run at a loss; and in Madrid and Rome, Naples and Brussels, the management have the use of the Opera House free, and receive subsidies of varying amounts.

Mr. Forsyth also gave a forecast of the next Covent Garden season. It would start with two cycles of 'Der Ring'; it would include the first performances in this country of a work of Wolf-Ferrari's entitled 'The Jewels of the Madonna, and 'La Conchita,' by a young Italian composer ; and it would again be considerably eked out with the Russian Ballet. Mr. Hammerstein's plans for the future are indefinite ; but up to the time of going to press no programme has been outlined, or any confirmation given of the rumour that he has closed with the offer of a big cinematograph firm to buy up the Opera House for use as a picture-theatre.

Certainly the most remarkable musical event that has taken place in London during the past month was the performance of Elgar's 'The dream of Gerontius' by the Oxford House Choral Society and Orchestra at Excelsior Hall, Bethnal Green, on January 20. The fine work done by Oxford House in the East-End through the energies of Mr. Cuthbert Kelly on the musical side, and Mr. Charles Fry on the dramatic side, is doing manifest wonders in the cultivation of artistic appreciation. This performance marked the climax on the musical side. It was not only well carried out, but it was eagerly listened to, with every appearance of earnest pleasure. Fortunately the interpretation of the work left nothing of it unrevealed. The chorus-singing had the right spiritual fervour, and was more than creditable in its technical precision; Miss Gwladys Roberts, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Campbell McInnes put their best into the solo work, and the orchestra was thoroughly efficient. This was a notable triumph of ambition and ability, which has a special meaning for those of us who are acquainted with the neighbourhood of Bethnal Green, especially on a Saturday night.

A good story is told by M. Pablo Casals in a recent number of the Wiener Konzertschau. While in Nizza last winter, he supped one evening with his friend Thibaud after a highly-successful concert given by the latter, and afterwards paid a visit to a small café-restaurant, where music was supplied by a salon orchestra conducted by an elderly gentleman with fiddle and bow in hand. Thibaud was astonished to receive a message from this gentleman with a request for an interview; still more so when he was offered the position of solo-violinist during the orchestra's visit to a French watering-place he had never heard of! The Kapellmeister had heard that the gentleman played the violin, and would he care to accept the engagement? Thibaud readily agreed, but feared that the salary he required—200 francs a month—might be too high. This proved to be the case, but an understanding was come to for 150 francs a month, the violinist to play two solos weekly. But Thibaud wished to do his friend Casals a good turn, and asked if the conductor had any use for a good violoncellist. 'Certainly,' was the answer, 'if he is really good.' Thibaud then asked if they might have their contracts at once, but the old gentleman replied, with a paternal pat on the shoulder, that they must first give proof of their ability. This was also agreed to, and the following evening at 7 o'clock the two arrived with Prof. Emil Lamberg (Casals's regular accompanist), and played the Brahms double concerto! The effect was astonishing. The pianoforte was of an ancient (and decayed) order, but as soon as they began the noisy café became silent. After the first movement the Kapellmeister, in some confusion, thanked the artists for the test-piece; later, when asked to join them in a bottle of champagne, he warmed up, and expressed his deep regret that he had not acceded to Thibaud's request, and made out the contracts at once!

THE ORIGIN OF THE CLARSECH OR IRISH HARP.*

By the Rev. F. W. Galpin.

Of ancient stringed instruments there are, we may roughly say, two broad types; in one the strings are stretched across a sound-box and lie parallel with it—this we may call the 'lyre' type, though including, for our present purpose, the various forms of psaltery and guitar; in the other the strings are attached to the upper board of the sound-box and rise vertically from it—this is the 'harp' type. It is most important to bear in mind these two marked differences and characteristics of the lyre and harp, for they form the basis of our present inquiry.

The earliest notices which we have of the musical instruments of the Kelts, the former inhabitants of the British Isles, occur in the writings of Greek and Roman historians. To pass over the allusions to their horns and trumpets, Diodorus Siculus, who lived just before the Christian era, in his Historical Library (Book V., ch. 2) informs us that among these Kelts were to be found certain musical composers called Bards, who, singing to the accompaniment of instruments like lyres (Ταὶς λύραις ὁμοίων) now lauded their fellows with hymns of praise, now cursed them with strains of invective. Ammianus also, who wrote 400 years later, says that these same Bards sang the deeds of their illustrious men to the sweet strains of the lyre (dulcibus lyrae modulis). Two hundred years after, Venantius Fortunatus, Bishop of Poictiers, gives us the name of this Bardic instrument: 'let the Briton,' he writes, 'sing to the Chrotta'; and under this Latin form we recognise the title given by the Kelts to their national instrument, so frequently mentioned in their old writings (such as the Seanchus Mor of the 5th century), namely the 'crot' or 'cruit.'

Thus far all is clear, and would have remained so had not later writers, by the loose application of inappropriate terms and a confused idea of the important structural differences already mentioned, persisted in calling this early British instrument a harp. Nowhere do we find it so described by those who saw and heard it. Greek and Roman writers tell us it was a form of lyre; Keltic records describe it as quadrangular, which the harp is not; Venantius carefully distinguishes it from the harp, which he says was the instrument of the barbarians; and Professor O'Curry, the greatest Irish savant of the last century, with a perfect knowledge of the ancient Keltic writings and poems, definitely states that the old Irish cruit was a lyre. Furthermore, after a careful survey of the illustrations still extant in manuscripts and on Keltic crosses from the 8th to the 10th centuries, there appears to be nothing which gives countenance to the erroneous and misleading use of the word harp, as representing the form of the crot or cruit of those early days. I willingly admit that, after the triangular harp had been adopted by the Irish minstrels, it was often called cruit as well as clarsech: in the same way as in our own days the violin is known amongst the Welsh peasantry as the 'crwth,' though there is little resemblance between it and the earlier instrument. But we are speaking of the centuries before 1000 A.D. and literature, drawing, and sculpture combine to represent the crot as a lyre, in its smaller form identical with the 'rotta,' so frequently depicted in Continental manuscripts, and the 'rote,' used in England during the Middle Ages. A good illustration is to be seen on the North Cross at Castledermot (co. Kildare) of the 8th century. The size of the instrument was about eighteen inches long by thirteen inches in width: it had five strings (Fig. 1).

We shall probably be told that this small lyre-shaped crot was an ecclesiastical instrument, and that it is for this reason it appears in the manuscripts and on the crosses; that side by side with it was the harp, the instrument of the warrior and the banquet hall. But there is nothing in the old records to support such a theory; in fact, such a distinction in usage was impossible in the days when kings were priests and priests were soldiers.

Again, however, we are met with the objection that in incidents referred to the 7th and 8th centuries we read of a small crot and a large crot, and of their playing together. It is doubtful of course, how far such allusions made by writers of a much later time reflect the actual practices of bygone centuries; but, at a slightly later date, we are not without illustrations of these two kinds of crot, for the sculptured crosses of the 9th and 10th centuries give reliable examples. For our present purpose we will take the famous carving on the 9th century cross at Ullard (co. Kilkenny)—famous because Edward Bunting, having received a rough sketch of the instrument, displayed it in his 'Ancient Music of Ireland' (1840) as the first specimen of 'a Harp without a fore-pillar' hitherto discovered out of Egypt, and therefore suggestive of a close affinity between the Irish people and the land of the Pharaohs. Later writers have taken the assertion and illustration as truth, and, though it is due to Miss Panum to say that in her interesting article on the 'Harp and Lyre in Northern Europe' (I.M.S. Quarterly Magazine, October, 1905) she has hesitated to accept the statement, she has after all but given us, in an incorrect engraving, an idea of what the instrument is.

I realised that only a personal inspection, with rubbings and photographs, could clear up so important a matter, and accordingly the June of 1909 found me at Ullard, and the doubtful points were soon settled. The instrument depicted represents a large quadrangular crot (Fig. 2)—the original having been probably about three feet in height by about one foot eight inches in its widest part—with the usual fore-pillar or support, though the stone is in part decayed. There were apparently six strings; these were fixed to the bottom of the frame and, passing over a long bridge resting on a sound-box which only partially covered the back of the instrument, were attached to pegs or pins placed in the upper curve or headpiece. The illustration is taken from a photograph of a careful rubbing on linen. Similar crots are represented on old crosses at Duiske Abbey, three miles from Ullard, at Castledermot (S. Cross), Kells (S. Cross), and Clonmacnoise (W. Cross), and in Scotland on the Great Cross (St. Martin's Cross) at Iona. Instruments of like character, but slightly different in outline, are illustrated on the Crosses of Monasterboice and Durrow, and also in an Irish manuscript (Brit. Mus. Vit. F. XI.) of the 9th century. But none of these instruments are harps, they are all of the lyre type: and if I were asked from whence they were derived, I should be inclined to attribute their appearance in Ireland to the close contact which existed between that country and the East in the 8th and 9th centuries, Greek priests finding refuge there and Irish laymen and ecclesiastics exploring the historic soil of Asia Minor, Egypt and the Holy Land. For these forms of lyre approach more closely the shape and structure of the upright psaltery, which was a common instrument in the countries bordering on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean.

So far, then (i.e., up to the year 1000 A.D.), we have no proof at present of the use of the triangular or true harp by the Irish people: the Keltic lyre and its affinities were the national instruments. The harp, though probably known, was not recognised, for the simple reason that it was not Keltic.

The appearance of the harp in Britain coincides with the coming of the Angle, Saxon, and Northman to our shores; though whether these sea-rovers, who were excellent carpenters as well, had added the fore-pillar which henceforth distinguishes their harp from that of Eastern nations we cannot tell, and to pursue the subject further is beyond our present purpose. Enough for us that in the earliest English epic, Beowulf of the 6th century, which relates the glorious deeds of Scandinavian heroes, the harp is frequently mentioned; and it is needless to repeat the constant allusions in the yet later literature of our country to show the popularity of the instrument. It was to be found everywhere, in the camp, and at the feast; the harper was welcomed by all and allowed a liberty of action that was often turned to strategic purposes. It is of greater interest to our present inquiry to observe that at the same time as the Kelt was carving on his crosses the lyre-shaped crot, large or small, the Englishman, as a true son of Scandinavia, Christian though he was, was adorning similar works of piety with representations of his beloved harp. It is to the eastern side of Scotland that we go for illustration, for there was found the stone on which the sculptor could work. These East-coast crosses, as at Aldbar (8th to 9th century), Nigg (9th to 10th century), Dupplin and Monifieth (10th to 11th century) show us only the triangular instrument, and it is known that at each of these places the English or Angles formed early settlements. On the other hand, it is not until the 13th or 14th centuries that on the West coast of Scotland we find the true harp depicted in a similar way—as at Iona, in St. Oran's Chapel, and on a column of the cathedral; also at Keills, in Argyll. The Nigg harp is illustrated in Fig. 3.

I have already said that the harp was probably not unknown in Ireland before the year 1000 A.D., though it was not recognised by the Irish minstrels. As early as the 6th century the communication between England and Ireland was close; the educational facilities found in the Irish monasteries, and the advanced state of learning which they had reached, gave opportunities of culture to an ambitious Englishman of which he readily availed himself. To take a single instance: in the 7th and 8th centuries there were so many Saxon students at Armagh that a third of the city was called the 'Trian Saxon,' or 'the Saxon third'; a statement which shows not only the popularity of the Irish schools, but that the Saxon and English, as foreigners, were settled in a distinct district of the city, as were the Jews in many a mediæval town of later days. That some of these English students should not have brought with them the harp is out of the question; but it had no attraction for Irish priest or Keltic bard.

Fig. 5.

With the onward march of time, however, the instrument was forced into a prominence which was bound to command attention.

Appearing first as marauders and pirates, Northman, Scandinavian and Dane—to whom the instrument had been for centuries a treasured possession—at last fixed their settlements on Irish soil and, in the 9th century at Dublin, Waterford and Limerick, established kingdoms which defied the attempts of Irish warriors to annihilate. Recognising their fate, foes, when not actually fighting, agreed to live together as friends, and frequent were the marriages between Danish chieftains and Irish princesses. The banqueting hall reverberated with the strains of the harp, and the Northman's minstrel rapidly became the rival of the Keltic crot-player. In this and in other ways the 'English harp' (as Gerbert terms it) was popularised among the Irish, and all the more readily because, during the 10th century, the influence of the clergy and monastic schools, with their affection for the past was diminishing, whilst the national poets and singers, with their attendant musicians, were receiving greater honours as they recounted the more turbulent phases of human life, and gloried in the deeds of battle and of pillage which were all too frequent. Yet it needed only the strong hand of one of the greatest of Irish chieftains, generally known as Brian Boru, a thorough musician if we may trust tradition, to weld into one the more discordant elements which existed among his own people as well as among the settlers; and when, in the year 1002, he assumed the kingship of Ireland, a ten-years' peace ensued, the longest known for centuries, in which art and industry alike could flourish. It was at this time, I consider, that the harp, owing to the brilliancy of its tone, which the Irish name Clarsech suggests, definitely displaced the less resonant lyre-shaped crot for all heroic and festive purposes. The earliest illustration we have of the instrument in Ireland occurs on the west front of Ardmore Cathedral, co. Waterford, which was built in the 12th century, though possibly the series of sculptures, in which the harp is portrayed, may be a century earlier (see 'Journal Soc. Ant. Ireland,' vol. 33).

The fact that it first occurs amongst a Danish Christian community, closely connected with England and the English Church, is suggestive. Of the beautiful and characteristic example on the famous Shrine of St. Mogue or Moedoc, in the Dublin National Museum, I hesitate to say much; the workmanship of the shrine has been attributed to the 9th century, owing to the long hair of the female figures represented on one of the ancient metal plates attached to its side; but the ornamental work still affixed to one end of the shrine, and in which the harp appears, seems on close inspection to be of later date, certainly not earlier than the 11th century, though the figure of the harpist has been made to correspond more or less with those on the metal plates. The reliquary of St. Patrick's tooth, on which another fine example of the instrument appears, was made in 1376; and one of the latest illustrations of the instrument in sculpture is to be seen on an altar tomb of the 15th century at Jerpoint Abbey, co. Kilkenny. As already stated, the clarsech, or Irish harp, appears in Western Scotland on stonework of the 13th and 14th centuries, having been introduced by Irish settlers, whilst Dante (c. 1300) informs us that the Irish harp had been introduced into Italy in his day, with which country Ireland had long been in ecclesiastical contact.

If, however, we deny to the Irish minstrels the honour of the invention of the harp, with which some patriots would credit them, we must nevertheless acknowledge the skill which they brought to its practice, and the peculiar improvements which they made in its construction. The English, or Northern harp, was strung with twisted horsehair or with sinews, but the Irish musician had been accustomed on his crot to use metal strings of drawn wire, either of 'findruinne,' a sort of brass, or of silver. With metal strings he therefore strung his clarsech and obtained a brilliancy and resonance unknown on the gut-stringed harp; to resist the tension of the wire strings he strengthened the framework of the instrument and increased the depth and size of the soundboard. The oldest Irish clarsech extant (Fig. 4)—now in Trinity College, Dublin, though it is not so ancient as the days of Brian Boru, to whom it has been ascribed—shows us, however, the great difference between the Irish instrument of the early 13th century and the small light-framed harps depicted in English manuscripts of the same date. Little is it to be wondered at that the performances of the Irish minstrels on such instruments excited the admiration and wonder of all who heard them; 'their skill is beyond comparison superior to that of any nation I have seen,' writes Giraldus Cambrensis at the end of the 12th century; 'the modulation is not slow and solemn as in the instruments of Britain to which we are accustomed, but the sounds are rapid and precipitate yet at the same time sweet and pleasing. It is wonderful how in such headlong rapidity of the fingers the musical proportions are preserved, and by their art kept faultless throughout.'

So the clarsech became the national emblem of Ireland, and found a place in the 13th century on her coinage and insignia. The twenty-nine strings, plucked with the pointed nail, were gradually increased to thirty-eight or even more, and the sweep of the graceful harmonic curve was extended until, in the 17th and early 18th centuries, the clarsech stood pre-eminent among diatonic harps for beauty of design as well as richness of tone. The Bunworth harp (Fig. 5), which was made by John Kelly in the year 1734 for the Rev. Charles Bunworth and is now the property of the present writer, shows that even though the original which suggested the clarsech was English, the elaboration of the instrument was undoubtedly Irish and the result an instrument unique in the history of Musical Art.

PHILIPP SPITTA.

By Jeffrey Pulver.

'Homer is not more decidedly the first of heroic poets, Shakespeare is not more decidedly the first of dramatists, Demosthenes is not more decidedly the first of orators, than Boswell is the first of biographers,' wrote Macaulay; and what Boswell was to Johnson and English literature, that and something more was Philipp Spitta to Bach and music. 'Something more,' because Spitta's work is not only pure biography, and a mirror for the reflection of the age in which his subjects lived; it is always work of the greatest importance to musical history, and of the highest value to musical historians.

A slight sketch of so eminent a man and his work will therefore surely not come amiss now, just seventy years after his birth; a man who, had he but lived a life of average length, could have easily still been with us.

Johann August Philipp Spitta, the son of a famous and popular poet, was born on December 27, 1841, at Wechold, near Hoya (Hanover), and after passing through the course of education usual in Germany, completed his studies in philology at the University of Göttingen. With a love for pedagogy stronger than that for any other profession, Spitta commenced his activity as teacher at the 'Ritter- und Dom-Schule' in Reval, at the comparatively early age of twenty-three. This post he held from 1864 till 1866, when he migrated to Sondershausen. The Gymnasium of this town enjoyed the benefit of his instruction until 1874; a year at the Nikolai Gymnasium in Leipsic followed.

It is at this point that we discover the first link which was afterwards to connect the names of Bach and Spitta so firmly. The formation of the famous Bach-Verein was going forward, and Spitta, entering the movement with enthusiasm, was one of the prime promoters of the scheme. His fame, principally on account of the publication of the first volume of the Bach biography, was now beginning to spread throughout Germany; and academic Berlin was at last impressed. A call to that city was responded to with alacrity by Spitta, now in his thirty-fourth year, and in 1875 he commenced his duties as professor of musical history at the University of Berlin, to which was added the position of permanent secretary to the Royal Academy of Arts. Soon after, a third post, that of professor at the Hoch-Schule für Musik, was offered him and accepted; and in 1876 he joined the council of directors of that institution; in 1882 he was elected active director for life.

The life story of Philipp Spitta is thus easily told, for it amounts to nothing more than a list of dates, and an indication of what advancement his learning brought him as these succeeded each other. Of the enormous amount of work he was able and obliged to perform in connection with his three posts, none of them a sinecure by any means, only passing mention can be made; but some idea of it may be obtained by considering his works, an account of which follows.

An earnest and painstaking worker, Spitta preferred the company of men of learning, and cared little for circulating in the society to which his high positions entitled him. It is therefore a little surprising, although by no means undeserved, that the title of honour, Geheimer Regierungsrat (Privy Councillor) should fall to him (1891).

No one more than musicians will regret that so useful a life should have been so short a one; Spitta died on April 13, 1894, in Berlin, having scarcely begun his fifty-third year.

We have two means of keeping the memory of Philipp Spitta fresh. For the world in general there is the fine statue in Berlin by Prof. Hildebrandt; but for musicians is reserved the enjoyment of a far finer memorial, the works of the departed. First among these, as much on account of its magnitude as of its importance, stands the greatest monument Spitta could possibly have raised for himself, the two volumes which contain all that ceaseless endeavour and tireless energy could collect concerning the greatest giant of music.

'Johann Sebastian Bach,'—published in Leipsic by Breitkopf & Härtel, the first volume in 1873, the second seven years later,—is the work by which the world knows Spitta; and rightly so, for I know of no single work of biography that is so ordered, so consistent, so rich in information and so straightforward in style as this; nor do I know of any other work of this kind whose abundant store of knowledge is so easily accessible. As I mentioned at the outset, Spitta's work is not merely biography in the ordinary meaning of the word;—it is much more. In its pages we find not only the life-story of the subject and a history of his works, but also a wealth of original historical criticism; chapters that are invaluable adjuncts to the history of music; and information on the predecessors, contemporaries and successors of the subject, so that the reader receives, not a detached account of one man lifted out of his environment, but rather one of a man in his natural surroundings; an account which demonstrates clearly the various forces that made their influence felt by him who is treated of, and the dominion he, in his turn, held over his successors.

The 'Life of Bach' by Philipp Spitta is, in fact, a history of the development of music and musical form during the period of the Cantor's life.

In the preface to the first volume, dated from Sondershausen, March, 1873, Spitta gives an account of the work and his method of writing it; from this preface we gather that for the account of Bach's life he turned for information first to Forkel, occasionally to Gerber, and chiefly to various autograph letters and other documents of Bach's. Every possible paper that had any connection with Sebastian or his family, every letter, and even genealogies, were consulted, and since Spitta did not accept the information they gave unless he could verify it, we can form some idea of the magnitude of his task.

A few words on Forkel's work, which formed the nucleus of Spitta's, may perhaps be acceptable. As Spitta himself says, this was the first advance on anything that had been previously written on Bach. Published in 1802 by Hoffmeister & Kühnel in Leipsic, Forkel's little work 'Ueber Johann Sebastian Bachs Leben, Kunst und Kunstwerke' was valuable on account of its author's intimacy with Bach's eldest son; and although the enthusiastic Forkel occasionally 'took something from the air' and indulged in a little fantasy, Spitta knew how much to use and what to reject. This unpretentious work of the cobbler's son who rose to the eminence of Doctor, honoris causa, enjoyed great popularity, and was translated into English in 1820 (Boosey), and into French in 1876.

In 1884-85, Novello & Co. (then Novello, Ewer & Co.) published the three volumes which were of such inestimable value to every English musician. I refer to the translation into English of Spitta's 'Bach' by Clara Bell and J. A. Fuller Maitland.

Had Spitta written nothing beyond the Bach biography he would still have deserved the fame that came to him, and have been but one more example of a great man whose reputation rests upon a single work. But this is not the case; he gave the world some of the most illuminating essays, articles and criticisms that were ever penned in the domain of musical literature; and it is to this less-known of his work that I wish to draw attention.

Between the years 1875 and 1882 the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, edited by Friedrich Chrysander, was greatly enriched by some of Spitta's best work. In Nos. 1 and 2, for 1875, we find that wonderfully-written essay on 'Die Anfänge Madrigalischer Dichtkunst in Deutschland' (The origin of madrigalian poetry in Germany), also reprinted in the Musikalisches Wochenblatt. To popularise the Bach-Verein, in which he was at that time beginning to take so great an interest, Spitta contributed to No. 20 (1875) an article on 'Der Bach-Verein zu Leipzig,' which explained the constitution and the objects of the Society. Nos. 46 and 47 of the same year contained the essay 'Uber das Accompagnement in den Compositionen Sebastian Bach's' (taken from the Musikalisches Wochenblatt). This seems to have called forth some criticisms from J. Schäffer, to which Spitta replied in No. 49 of the same journal. The issues for 1876 contained only one specimen of Spitta's work; the speech which he, as secretary to the Academy of Arts, delivered in Berlin on the Emperor's birthday, on the 'Bildende Kunst und Musik in ihrem gegenseitigen geschichtlichen Verhältniss' (The instructive Arts and Music compared). This subject was renewed when Spitta delivered the lecture 'Poesie als Mittlerin zwischen Bildende Kunst und Musik' (Poetry as connecting link between the Arts and Music), on March 22, 1878. From 1880 to 1882, inclusive, the Allgemeine printed several reviews and criticisms of Spitta's, notably those in Nos. 26 and 27, 'Zur Herausgabe der Briefe Mozarts,' a review of Nottebohm's publication, 'Mozartiana' (1880), and the critical review of Ranieri de Calsabigi's 'Paride ed Elena.' Nos. 47 and 48 (1881) and No. 16 (1882) brought to the public eye Spitta's essays, entitled 'Bachiana' (on the various arrangements of and uses made by Bach of strange original compositions); and with this article his connection with the Allgemeine ceased.

In 1885 Spitta founded with Chrysander the Vierteljahrschrift für Musikwissenschaft (Musical Quarterly), the editorship of which was placed in the able hands of Dr. Guido Adler. To this periodical Spitta frequently contributed reviews and criticism, and some few important articles such as 'Sperontes Singende Muse' (1885), which is a mine of information in respect of the history of folk and home music. Another is the valuable historical, bibliographical and critical article on 'Rinaldo di Capua' (1887). Two other articles too important to leave unmentioned are, first, one on the Arie from Bach's 'Johannes'-Passion (1888), and the other on 'Die musica enchiriadis und ihr Zeitalter' (1889), the latter being a splendid monograph on mediæval music. From 1889 onward nothing of importance appeared from Spitta's pen, except some few lesser reviews; and his death in 1894 brought the publication to a standstill.

Several of these essays, together with some that were new, appeared in book form. The first series, entitled 'Zur Musik,' is a collection of sixteen essays on subjects as far apart as 'Kunstwissenschaft und Kunst' and 'Beethoveniana.' The preface is dated Berlin, February 27, 1892. A second set appeared in 1894, under the title 'Musik geschichtliche Aufsätze' (Musico-historical essays), and the preface to this work, dated March 9, was probably the last thing Spitta wrote. In it he explains that the volume under consideration was published with the primary object of giving publicity to the first essay it contains—that on 'Heinrich Schütz, Leben und Werke.' As we will see later on, Spitta was engaged upon the editing of a complete critical edition of Schütz's works, and the reason for this desired publicity is easy to understand. The essay was afterwards reprinted in the Allgemeine deutsche Biographien.

I must now mention two of Spitta's articles which will be of special interest to English readers. They are the masterly biographies of Schumann and Spontini, which were written for 'Grove.' That on Spontini, running to thirty-three columns, is one of the finest lives of this very interesting individual we have, especially when we consider the condensed form in which it had to appear. The one on Schumann is longer, and occupies seventy-six columns of 'Grove.' This latter biography was also given in Nos. 37 and 38 of the 'Sammlung Musikalischer Vorträge' (Collection of musical addresses), published in 1879 by Breitkopf & Härtel, and edited by Paul Count Waldersee; but, according to 'Grove's' article on Spitta, it was originally expressly written for that Dictionary. The collection just mentioned also contains a splendid 'summary' of the 'Life of Bach,' by Spitta. I said 'summary'; it is that only when we compare it with the greater work—considered alone it is most comprehensive.

Another most interesting essay touching Bach is the one Spitta wrote for the 'Historische und Philologische Aufsätze,' dedicated to Ernst Curtius, on the occasion of his seventieth birthday. It is called 'Über die Beziehungen Sebastian Bachs zu Christian Friedrich Hunold und Mariane von Ziegler' (Bach's connections with C. F. Hunold and M. von Ziegler); these two worthies being writers contemporary with the great Cantor. A sketch on Bach's 'Passion-Musik' (1893), two speeches on 'Händel und Bach' (1885), and contributions to the Grenzbote, the Deutsche Rundschau, the Allgemeine deutsche Biographien and Eitner's Monatshefte für Musikgeschichte, complete, as far as I am able to trace, the list of Spitta's literary works.

There remains to be considered only Spitta as a musical editor. In this connection he served on the committee directing the publication of the series 'Denkmäler deutscher Tonkunst' (1892) (Monuments of German composition), on which he was associated with such men as Helmholtz, Chrysander, Brahms, and Joseph Joachim. Far more ambitious and important was his publication, in two folio volumes, of Buxtehude's organ works (1875-76). To each of these volumes he wrote an invaluable preface, teeming with historical, critical, and analytical notes of the greatest importance, followed by a 'Kritischer Commentar.' In 1885 he commenced the editing of the complete works of Heinrich Schütz (mentioned above), published by Breitkopf & Härtel. Here again he provided a critical and historical preface, besides an interesting treatise explaining the ancient musical notation.

The series up to date consists of seventeen volumes. Nos. i. to xiv. are Philipp Spitta's work, vols. xv. and xvi. were edited by his brother Friedrich, and vol. xvii., appearing in 1909, by A. Schering.

The musical works of Friedrich the Great, King of Prussia, next occupied him, and in 1889 Breitkopf & Härtel published the two beautifully-executed volumes which contain the royal musician's flute sonatas, concerti, &c. Of this work the British Museum possesses a copy of the edition de luxe, presented by the German Emperor.

There remains only the 'History of the Romantic Opera in Germany,' which Spitta left unfinished; it is a thousand pities that death should have robbed the musical world of so interesting a work, especially so since it was almost completed.

It will now be seen that Spitta's claims to recognition rest on a much firmer foundation than that provided by the great Bach biography, however superlatively excellent that alone may be, and it is much to be regretted that his other writings are not so well-known in this country as the one with which he attained to his greatest fame.

THE TEACHING OF MUSICAL COMPOSITION.*

No middle-aged man can look back on the last thirty years of English music without being struck by the immense progress of the nation in the quantity and quality of its composers and their works. Even the hardiest laudator temporis acti would find it difficult to maintain that in mid-Victorian times our national output was either substantial or convincing; and though we do not pretend, as do some false prophets, that in these few decades the grub has developed into the perfect butterfly, yet we can reasonably claim that serious English composers have now reached so high a level of technique, and reached it in such numbers, that nothing seems lacking in their work save those great ideas which are the gifts of the gods alone.

Difficult as it always is to gauge the tendencies of the time we ourselves are living in, yet few will be found to refuse the title of Renaissance to the period of which we are speaking. After a long winter of discontent the arrival of spring is heralded on all sides; and though the full harvest is not yet here, the early garnerings are irrefutable proof of the germination that has been taking place. The causes of this germination are, like the causes of all artistic movements, subtle and various; but, in so far as they are outward and visible, it is generally and justly admitted that they spring largely from the work and influence of two men—Mr. Corder at the Royal Academy and Sir Charles Stanford at the Royal College. Mr. Corder gave us some years ago the fruits of his experience in one of the most practical books ever written; and now Sir Charles, leaving alone the purely practical aspect, provides a complementary work of subjective wisdom. From what we have said it will be realised that we are not niggardly in our gratitude to these two great sowers of seed, and we will further add, in regard to Sir Charles's book, that we can imagine nothing on the same lines more suggestive or complete; but in view of the fact that many thoughtful watchers of the rising generation, sanguine and even confident of the ultimate issue, are yet gravely concerned at the immediate outlook, it will be pardoned if we abandon the conventional manner of reviewing the book before us in favour of a broader consideration of its method and significance.

The two schools of composition-teaching to which we refer may justly be judged, as to process, by the character of the two books given us by the master-minds. In detail, of course, all good teaching must have a large common factor ; but it does not entail much exaggeration if we label one school as essentially analytic, the other as synthetic. Epitomizing the two methods for the sake of antithesis, we may say roughly that Mr. Corder teaches the pupil how to do it, while Sir Charles Stanford analyses for him how it is done. The one, to borrow a distinction from the logicians, approaches the subject as an art, in the logical sense of something to be practised, the other as a science, or something to be known. We believe, whole-heartedly, that both these views must, a priori, minimise the value of the personal equation in any student ; and we maintain, a posteriori, that it is just this want of individuality that robs the work of the pupils of both schools, brilliant as is their craftsmanship, of the note of personal distinction.

'It is an almost cruel task,' says Sir Charles, 'to write a movement, bar by bar, modulation by modulation, figure by figure, exactly the same in all respects, save theme, as a work by another composer ; but it is the only way to get at the root of the matter, and it must be faced.' We can only suggest 'entirely' instead of 'almost.' The passage is followed by a bar-to-bar analysis of a Beethoven sonata of the early second period, to help the student to manufacture a work on the same scaffolding. We submit that the process, widely accepted as it may be, is fundamentally wrong, and we believe, with all respect to Sir Charles, that the whole point of view which the passage quoted connotes can account for the second-hand impression conveyed by the work of so many of our most promising young composers. 'If you want your child to grow into a good man,' said John Wesley, 'first break his will' ; but modern society has revolted from the bloodless prig such an edict conjures up. Sir Charles's edict seems to us a musical parallel,—as if he were to say, 'If you want your son to be a composer, first teach him to write like the early Beethoven.' We can conceive of no device more calculated to nip originality in the bud.

Being less directly concerned with Mr. Corder, we may be content with saying that his method appears dangerous from an opposite standpoint. His school, with their amazing technical skill, see so clearly how everything is done that they seem eternally to be trying, not to sing their own song, but to roar a little louder than the latest lion. We recently heard at the same concert two works by two of our foremost young composers, one of each school. The work of Mr. Corder's representative, brilliantly clever though it was, was so exactly like Debussy that—on the analogy of the shopwalker who dressed too like a gentleman to be one—it was obviously an imitation. The work of the other school, on the contrary, full of deep feeling and genuine thought, was covered from beginning to end by the mantle of Brahms, and the highest compliment is to say it was nearly worthy of its model. But in all seriousness we would ask, not merely whether either work was worth composing or performing, but the more important question whether we were not witnessing the sacrifice of two great talents, one on the altar of cleverness, the other on that of tradition? To be one more name in the great succession is the unspoken prayer in the heart of every young composer ; but the goal is not to be reached either by consciously fettering our impulses in order to link up with the last great name, or by adopting all the latest shibboleths lest we be labelled out-of-date. And that these two alternatives are accepted by our young composers as their Scylla and Charybdis is, we believe, the present great peril to English music.

THE LONDON OPERA HOUSE.

By Hermann Klein.

As I write, the ultimate fate of this splendid enterprise hangs in the balance. On his return to London, after a flying visit to New York, Mr. Oscar Hammerstein decided to take the public into his confidence and tell them exactly how matters stood. The gist of a dozen 'interviews' may be summed up in one sentence : Unless the greater part of the boxes and front rows of stalls are subscribed for, the summer season promised for May, June and July will not take place, and the London Opera House will, so far as this form and class of entertainment are concerned, have to close its doors. In other words, a substantial subscription is just as essential to the permanent carrying on of this undertaking as it is to that of Covent Garden or any other expensive operatic institution. If London wants it, it will have to pay for it on the basis of solid and regular support, furnished in the first instance by wealthy patrons, who ask no questions but trust to the known reputation, conscientiousness, and ambition of the impresario. If London does not want it—and no mere caprice or chance hit that draws two good houses out of five will meet the necessities of the case—then it must 'go by the board,' and another deplorable addition will have been made to the long list of operatic managerial fiascos associated with the British Metropolis. Let us hope that this regrettable, nay discreditable, result will not materialize. There may be things susceptible of improvement, but the history of this opera house, so far as it has gone, has been full enough of promise to justify its continuance. It deserves better than to be cut off at this early stage of its career.

It is important to be able to add quickly to a new repertory. There must necessarily be certain operas that drop out almost as soon as they are dropped in ; they fail to hit the mark, and the discriminating manager has no further use for them. At the same time, when there are five performances a week to give, variety is a valuable feature. It does not pay to repeat a single work frequently, or ring the changes on two or three, however successful they may have proved, until subscribers and public alike begin to show signs of resenting the monotony. As it happens, Mr. Hammerstein's subscribers are not (to his infinite regret) numerous enough to awaken fear of trouble ; but the general body of opera-goers have to be considered, and in this Metropolis,—unlike Paris, Vienna, or Berlin,—that section of the population is not yet so large that a solitary successful production will suffice to fill the opera-house once or twice a week for six months.

'TALES OF HOFFMANN.'

In the circumstances, therefore, it was fortunate for Mr. Hammerstein that he should have been ready by the Christmas holidays with an attraction so likely to be popular (without palling rapidly upon his clientèle) as Offenbach's 'Tales of Hoffmann.' The choice of this opera, which had done him yeoman service in New York, and had previously 'caught on' in London, was obviously wiser than depending upon ancient favourites such as 'Norma,' 'William Tell,' 'Lucia,' or even 'Faust.' These had all been tried and found wanting in the first month of the season, leaving only 'Hérodiade,' 'Quo Vadis,' and (thanks to Miss Felice Lyne) 'Rigoletto' to help to fill the weekly bill. It is worth while to note the fate of these various productions and revivals, as marking the progress of events in Mr. Hammerstein's historical crusade. So far it has prospered almost entirely on French opera, and, unless I am greatly mistaken, the American impresario will continue to give us little else during this experimental season of his. He may, of course, mount the new Scottish opera, whereof the Duke of Argyll has provided the libretto. I hope he will; for if successful it might prove the thin end of the wedge to that introduction of opera in the vernacular which everyone is wishing to see the main, if not the exclusive, pabulum of the London Opera House fare. Meanwhile we have no right to complain if Mr. Hammerstein perseveres with the works that yield most towards the payment of his costly expenses, and which his present company is best equipped to perform adequately.

When the 'Contes d'Hoffmann' was first given at the Paris Opéra-Comique in 1881 (it had been played thirty years before at the Odéon in the form of a comedy), the three principal feminine rôles were undertaken by a single artist—the gifted Adèle Isaac. Why this rule has not always been followed it is difficult to say, unless it be that versatile sopranos are scarce, and that it is easier to find three prime donne capable of doing justice to one character and one act apiece, than to discover one prima donna who can do equal justice to all three. A solitary baritone, truly, has always been employed (as Taskin was in the original cast) for the three parts of Coppélius, Dapertutto, and Dr. Miracle; and in these M. Maurice Renaud once more gave evidence of the fact that, had he never been a singer, he could always have been an actor of extraordinary skill and resource. In his case the triple delineation amounted to a superb tour de force. On the December 17, M. Renaud having terminated his engagement, his place in the opera was filled by M. Vilmos Beck, a baritone who has sung a good deal at the Paris Opéra, and quite recently in America in Puccini's 'Girl of the Golden West.' The newcomer has a powerful and agreeable voice, which he uses with some skill, though apt to employ too 'open' tones in strenuous passages. Evidently an experienced actor, he provided an effective replica of M. Renaud's fine performance and was at his best in the rôle of Dr. Miracle. In the hands of Mr. Frank Pollock, an American tenor who also made his début in this production, the part of Hoffmann has lost much of its proper interest and importance. His voice is throaty, his singing monotonous, and his acting devoid of animation or colour. Miss Felice Lyne was clever as the doll, Olympia, though her rare vocal gifts were practically wasted upon the music; Mlle. Fer, as Antonia, was heard to advantage in the ensembles of the last act, while the brief but showy character of Giulietta was sustained at the outset by Mlle. Lina Cavalieri, and after her departure by Mlle. Olchanski. All these artists certainly lend variety to Offenbach's opera, but I hope nevertheless again to hear some singer of supreme talent repeating the triumph of Mlle. Isaac in the three soprano rôles. The minor parts were adequately filled, and the opera handsomely mounted. Signor Merola conducted.

'Hérodiade.'

Two or three noteworthy changes were made in the cast of 'Hérodiade.' One of these was the substitution of Mlle. Isabeau Catalan for Mlle. Cavalieri in the rôle of Salomé, whose music certainly derived an enhanced degree of sonority and importance from the more opulent tones of the new singer. Mlle. Catalan is taking some time to become accustomed to the dampness of our present winter; it seems to affect seriously the clearness and resonance of her timbre. But she is a very intelligent singer and actress, and presented a Salomé who, if not very remarkable for sensuous grace, became a personage of much force and intensity of temperament. M. José Danse, who succeeded M. Renaud as Hérode, gave a solid, earnest interpretation of his music. Some slight modifications in the scenic detail of the Temple scene proved both sensible and welcome. Later on, Salomé had a still more satisfactory exponent in Mlle. Olchanski, who sang well in 'Quo Vadis?'

'Le Jongleur de Notre Dame.'

Massenet's 'Jongleur de Notre Dame,' produced at this house on January 10, seems to have pleased the audience better than some of the critics. The appreciation of an opera of this peculiar type is essentially a matter of taste. To folks who love not French opera in general or Massenet in particular it has, of course, few redeeming features, and the last of these disappears altogether when the rôle of the tenor hero is appropriated by a soprano and a woman is introduced into a monastery disguised in man's attire! Yet, after all, what have we here that is not accepted without question, when the Orpheus in Gluck's opera, the Leonora in 'Fidelio,' the Arsace in 'Semiramide,' the pages in 'Les Huguenots' and 'Tannhäuser,' or the Siebel in 'Faust' are concerned? What if the part of the Boy-Juggler was originally written for a tenor? By afterwards giving it to Mary Garden and altering it to suit her, the composer not only exercised a discretion to which he was entitled, but imparted to his opera, as I can personally testify, a measure of variety and interest that helped largely to enhance its popularity. The Chicago singer achieved what was required, because she approached her task in the right spirit of picturesque feeling and romance. Mlle. Victoria Fer, an artist of singular intelligence and dramatic aptitude, has now done the same thing here, and impressed all who witnessed it by the sincerity, the emotional fervour, the characteristic mediæval simplicity and charm of her impersonation. Her admirable singing and acting elicited an amount of spontaneous applause that was quite in proportion to the hearty reception bestowed upon the entire performance.

Regarding the merits of Massenet's score—fully discussed, by the way, when 'Le Jongleur' was mounted at Covent Garden in 1906—opinions will necessarily differ so long as English critics continue to hold divergent views about the exact quality and value of this composer's art. Those who can see in him naught but what is artificial, mechanical, and lacking in inspiration, must of necessity find the opera dull. For my own part I find it quite the reverse. I perceive in it a far greater truth of dramatic expression, far greater richness and appropriateness of orchestral detail, far more purity of melodic outline and beauty of harmonic structure than in the earlier operas from the same pen. Whether it will live as long as 'Manon' remains to be seen; but if its story made the same universal appeal and dealt with elemental passions instead of a curious flight of religious fancy, it would undoubtedly be hailed at this moment as the chef-d'œuvre of the Massenet school. The mounting of the work at the new house did immense credit to the able régisseur, M. Jacques Coini, though the electrical effects in the final scene of the miracle, when the statue of the Madonna comes to life, might be toned down with advantage. Besides Mlle. Fer, the cast included M. Georges Chadal as the Abbey Cook, and M. Francis Combe as the Prior, while M. Luigi Cherubini conducted.

The following candidates passed the last fellowship examination held by the Royal College of Organists: A. F. Barnes (Farnborough), F. J. Buckle (London), W. T. A. Claughton (Settle), T. H. Croxall (Leicester), P. Hoggarth (N. Shields), E. M. Moores (Cheetham), W. H. Mundell (Kilmacolm), R. W. Palmer (Kettering), W. H. Perry (Arlesey), A. Phillips (Sunderland), C. A. Salt (Birmingham).

Church and Organ Music.

A SUGGESTION FOR IMPROVING THE PLAN OF ORGANS.*

By A. T. Froggatt.

Possibly the subject of this paper would be better described as 'A suggestion for improving the plan of the Pedal organ.' But the effect of an organ is so profoundly modified by the contents (or non-contents) of the pedal department, that any improvement in the plan of the latter must necessarily result in the improvement of the whole instrument.

The object of the Pedal organ is, or should be, two-fold: first, to provide a suitable bass to as many manual stops as possible; secondly, to provide one or more suitable solo effects. The former is by far the most important of these objects, and in the large majority of the organs built in this country it is the only one that receives any consideration. In too many cases it receives very little.

Take the case of a good average specimen of the English organ—three manuals and thirty speaking stops. There will probably be a Great and Swell of ten stops each, a Choir organ of six stops, and a Pedal of four. These latter, in the most favourable examples, will consist of an open diapason, 16-ft.; a bourdon or violone, 16-ft.; an 8-ft. stop of wood or metal, and a 16-ft. reed. This is the best four-stop Pedal organ that can be devised, containing, as it does, a bass to four stops on the Great organ—namely, open diapason, stopped diapason, principal, and trumpet. Of course, if the violone be preferred to the bourdon, a bass is provided for the gamba rather than for the stopped diapason. The bass flute also, sometimes substituted for the octave bass of metal from motives of economy, affords an inadequate support for the Great principal. But what about a bass for the Swell and Choir organs? The latter, indeed, with the help of the bourdon or violone, will fare not too badly; but in a double sense the Swell is in a hopeless case. With the box closed, the bourdon may serve for a bass; with the box open, the diapason may be added, but only for a more or less full swell; but, whatever the number of stops drawn, it is obviously impossible on such an organ to provide a Pedal which shall be equally suitable for open or closed swell, not to speak of the gradations between the two. I think the late Mr. Thomas Casson was the first to make a serious attempt to grapple with the difficulties of the situation. His specifications are ingenious, but I do not think they can be accepted as entirely satisfactory. It is of course easy to exaggerate the importance of providing a suitable Pedal to be used in conjunction with the Swell pedal, because few pedal passages of any importance can be played with one foot, even if the organist possesses sufficient dexterity to reach the notes, without sacrificing the phrasing: although one is sometimes astonished to find the signs of crescendo and decrescendo sprinkled over the pages of music intended for the organ in passages where both feet are busily employed in playing. At the same time, there can be no doubt but that the difficulty of obtaining an appropriate bass for the Swell organ is a very real one.

My plan for the improvement of the Pedal organ is simply this: abolish the pedal stops, as such, altogether and extend the compass of as many manual stops as possible one octave lower than at present. The compass of the pedal-board and also of the manuals will of course remain unaltered. The coupling actions will also remain as before. By pressing a button placed under the manual, the pedal action, becoming attached to that manual and at the same instant detached from either of the other manuals to which it may have been previously united, will operate in the sub-octave upon whatever stops are drawn on the manual in question; and should that manual be coupled to another, the pedal action will operate upon the latter also.

I have said that the coupling actions will remain as before. By this I do not mean that the present clumsy arrangement of draw-stop couplers is to be retained. When the Pedal organ is required uncoupled, in the present sense of the term, this will be effected by the pressure of a second button adjacent to the first. As the employment of an uncoupled Pedal is the exception and not the rule, it will be better to make it dependent upon the employment of a separate piece of mechanism.

Now for the advantages of the plan: first, ease of manipulation. Except in the rare case of those organs in which a more or less suitable 'pedal bass' is provided for each manual, when the organist changes from one manual to another he has not only to push in one coupler and draw another, but has also to change the pedal stops. With the Pedal constructed as I suggest, a single movement of the thumb does all this.

Secondly, homogeneity of musical effect. Instead of—as is far too often the case at present, at all events in small and moderate-sized organs—having no choice beyond that of the dreadful boom being either on or off, a really artistic bass would be available comparable to the effect of violoncello and double-bass, or of bassoon and double-bassoon, in the orchestra. Thirdly, stop for stop, there would be a saving of space and also of expense. Whether the Pedal organ consisted of few or many stops, the saving of space would be considerable, seeing that each stop available on the Pedal would mean twelve pipes instead of thirty. Although the largest pipes would remain, still the saving of space occupied by the remaining eighteen would be something gained. And the expense of the new mechanism would be much less than that of the additional pipes, the difference in cost increasing, of course, according to the number of pedal stops.

On the other hand, pipe for pipe, the new arrangement would be immensely superior to the old. At present, 120 pipes on the Pedal mean four stops; but if my suggestion were adopted, 120 pipes on the Pedal would mean ten stops; and although in this case the cost of the organ would of course be greater, the resources of the Pedal would be more than doubled, while its efficiency would be increased to an extent that cannot be expressed in mere figures. A Pedal organ of ten such stops as I propose would provide for the downward extension of four stops on the Great, four on the Swell, and two on the Choir organ.

Fourthly, many valuable pipes which at present really do very little work would be extensively utilised. We rightly lay great stress on the importance of every stop running through; but I sometimes wonder if many of us realise how comparatively seldom a good organist causes the nine longest pipes of any manual stop to sound. The twelve lowest keys he practically never touches with his fingers, unless when playing without pedals; and even then he scarcely ever goes below G. And when a manual is coupled to the Pedal organ, inasmuch as by far the greater part of the music written for the latter is contained within the octave A—A, it is surprising how comparatively seldom the lowest nine notes, and therefore the lowest nine pipes of any manual stop, are sounded. Of course, I am thinking of organists who are, or endeavour to be, artists, and not of those whose right foot is usually perched upon the 'unjust eminence' of the swell pedal while the upper keys of their pedal clavier possess surfaces as smooth and level as on the day on which they were fitted to the instrument.

Are there any disadvantages attending the system which I advocate? I believe the only disadvantage to be a loss of power when pedalling in octaves. This could be obviated by coupling a second manual to the Pedal. And there is no reason why one or more independent pedal stops of thirty pipes should not be included in the specification of a large organ, as before. Mr. Casson, indeed, in his scheme for a three-manual organ of twenty actual stops, submitted to a meeting of the Musical Association just six years ago, included an 8-ft. flute of thirty pipes on the Pedal. However, for my own part, these entirely independent Pedal stops, except perhaps in the case of very large organs, seem to be superfluous.

It is perhaps unnecessary to point out that the objection to 'borrowing' cannot apply to my proposal, because there can never arise any danger of a given pipe being required to act as a manual and as a pedal-pipe at the same time. That is to say, such a thing could not happen except in the unprecedented case of the tenor descending a whole octave below the bass.

The idea of borrowing an 8-ft. stop from the manual and causing it to sound in 16-ft. pitch on the Pedal is, as probably most of you are aware, not original. It was adopted at Halle as long ago as the year 1500. And to a limited extent modern builders have acted on this principle. But I can see no reason why this system of making the Pedal the completion of the manual should not be carried out on every stop.

We are asked to state that the annual service of the National Welsh Festival will be held in St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday, February 29, at seven o'clock, and that singers desirous of joining the choir on that occasion are invited to attend on any Thursday evening at St. Benet's Welsh Church, Queen Victoria Street, at 8 p.m. The organizing secretary is Mr. J. E. Davis, 39, Upper Park Fields, Putney, from whom the Festival Service Book (in both notations) may be had, price 3½*d.* post-free.

That enthusiasm for the organ and all that pertains to it, which is such a feature in the North of England, was well illustrated recently when, under the auspices of the Oldham and District Organists' Association, Mr. C. H. Moody gave an organ recital in the Parish Church, Oldham, and later, at the annual dinner, an address on 'The art of the organist.' Mr. Moody rightly takes a high view of the duties of an organist, and his admirable address, which appeared in the local papers, should prove most helpful to those who were present, or to any who may read it. Our Cathedral organists may, if they will, exert wide influence, and the opportunities given by such Societies as that mentioned above, can do much to raise the ideals and status of their members.

A small two-manual and pedal organ has been erected in the chapel of the Ursuline Convent, Upton, Forest Gate, by the Positive Organ Company, Limited. It is interesting in view of the fact that it had to be fitted into a very difficult site, viz., a small gallery in which the available depth was only 2 feet 4½ inches, and the height 8 feet 7 inches. It has been arranged with the open diapason overhanging the front of the gallery and with the console at one side of the instrument in a small bay. It is blown by electric installation.

SPECIAL SERVICES.

The Carol Services at Westminster Abbey proved as convincing as in former years, and were each and all attended by crowded and reverent congregations. The effect to those seated in the nave and more distant parts was beautiful in the extreme, and the wide diversity of style and treatment as shown by the various composers received ample attention from the choir. Sir Frederick Bridge was at the organ, and had evidently taken the greatest pains to secure an interpretation which should be worthy of the best traditions for which the Abbey has long been famous.

The Carol Service annually given by the choir of St. Augustine's Church, South Croydon, is a feature worthy of more than local interest. The church, with its red-capped tower, lies just to the right of the main Brighton Road, between Croydon and Purley, and must be a familiar object to those frequently travelling to and from Brighton. The Vicar, the Rev. J. H. White, is a strong advocate of good music as an aid to worship, and he is fortunate in possessing so able and hard-working an organist and choir-master as Mr. H. L. Sandy, who, owing to his excellent qualities as a trainer of boys' voices, and to the hearty and intelligent support rendered to him by the adult members of the choir (many of whom possess more than ordinary experience in vocal work), is enabled to maintain a very high level of excellence in the musical services.

At the service on Christmas Eve, the choir, according to their usual custom, sang the first number in the vestry, the music being only just audible to the congregation. All the carols, excepting those with an independent accompaniment, were sung without the organ, and the choir throughout displayed a refinement of tone and expression, and an ease in the retention of pitch, which can be secured only by high intelligence and good training.

The following is a list of carols sung:

'The Manger Throne' ('Like silver lamps') Steggall.
Processional hymn, 'O come, all ye faithful' ... ...
Carol for Christmas Eve, 'The Lord at first had Adam made' ... ... Traditional.
Besançon Carol, 'Shepherds, shake off your drowsy sleep' ('Chantez! Bargies, Noué! Noué!)
Carol written by Martin Luther to his little son, 1540 ... ... A. J. Phillips (member of choir).
'In Bethlehem, that noble place' ... ... Ouseley.
'Come to the Manger' ... ... Waddington.
'In Bethlehem's ancient city' ... John E. West.
Carol for Christmas Day, 'Joyful hearts to Thee we raise' ... C. Pellew (member of choir).
'Sleep, Holy Babe' (men's voices) ... ... Dykes.
'Ring! Christmas bells, this wintry morn' Longhurst.

On December 31, by special invitation of the governor and chaplain of H.M. Prison, Walton, Liverpool, the choir of Walton Parish Church, under the direction of Mr. Albert Orton, rendered a full choral service, including an anthem and selection of carols, in the chapel attached to the Prison.

At Christ Church, Harrogate, Brahms's 'Requiem' was performed by the Christ Church Musical Society on December 12. The soloists were Miss Ella Mallinson and Mr. J. O'Connor. The organist was Mr. John Pullein, of St. Peter's, Harrogate; the pianist, Mr. A. E. Davison; and the conductor, Mr. J. F. Chubb.

Gounod's 'The Redemption' was performed by Chichester Cathedral Oratorio Society on December 14, under the direction of Mr. F. J. W. Crowe, with Mr. E. Stephenson as organist.

A selection from the first part of the 'Messiah,' concluding with the Hallelujah Chorus, was given after evensong on December 17 at Holy Trinity Church, Stroud Green. The choir was augmented by the ladies of the Stroud Green Choral Association. The solos were sung by Madame Lily Jönsson, Mr. Hawkins, Mr. Wilfrid Lawrence, and Mr. Dean. Mr. Charles Warner was at the organ and Mr. H. J. Timothy conducted.

A presentation was made on January 1 to Mr. Henry Greening, who has been a member of the choir of Highnam Church, Gloucester, for sixty years. The occasion was the annual choir supper given by Sir Hubert Parry at Highnam Court.

ORGANIST, CHOIRMASTER AND CHOIR APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. James S. Corin, organist and choirmaster, Streatham United Parish Church.
Mr. H. Bromley Derry, organist and choirmaster, St. Luke's, Redcliffe Square, South Kensington.
Mr. Percy W. Jones, organist and choirmaster, Parish Church, Gorleston.
Mr. Carl Olwer, organist and choirmaster, All Saints,' Boothen, Stoke-on-Trent.
Mr. Edgar Smith, organist and choirmaster, New Free Church, Hampstead Garden Suburb, N.W.
Mr. John A. Sowerbutts, organist and choirmaster, St. Stephen's, Paddington.
Mr. W. T. Winkworth, organist and choirmaster, Parish Church, Farnham Royal, Slough.

Mr. Victor A. Stafford, solo alto, St. Mary Abchurch, E.C.

The following scholarships will be open to competition at the Royal Academy of Music towards the end of April: The Parepa-Rosa Scholarship (female vocalists, ages 18-22; not open to students); the Thalberg Scholarship (male pianists, ages 14-21); the Sterndale Bennett Scholarship (any branch of music, ages 14-21).

Reviews.

Richard Wagner. Sämtliche Schriften und Dichtungen. Fünfte Auflage. Bände 11 und 12.

[Breitkopf & Härtel.]

With these two volumes the new and authoritative edition of Wagner's prose and verse is complete. They contain matter supplementary to that of the ten volumes of the older editions. Some of this matter has been accessible in various quarters—in the posthumous volume (1885) of 'Entwürfe, Gedanken, Fragmente,' in the 'Nachgelassene Schriften und Dichtungen' (1895), in the 'Bayreuther Blätter,' in Kapp's 'Der junge Wagner,' and in various other monographs and journals; but it is convenient to have it all gathered together in this handy form. The eleventh volume contains for the most part the texts of the operas and dramas that are known only by name to the majority of readers,—'Die Hochzeit' (1832), 'Die Feen' (1832-33), 'Das Liebesverbot' (1834; now published for the first time), 'Die Bergwerke zu Falun' (1841-42), 'Die hohe Braut' (1836), 'Männerlist grösser als Frauenlist, oder Die glückliche Bärenfamilie' (1837; here published for the first time), 'Die Sarazenin' (1841-43), 'Friedrich I.' (1846-48; here published for the first time), 'Jesus von Nazareth' (1848), 'Die Sieger' (1856), 'Parzival' (1857-65),—and more familiar things such as 'Das Liebesmahl der Apostel' and the sketches for 'Tristan,' the 'Meistersinger,' and the 'Tannhäuser' Venusberg scene. The twelfth volume of the new edition mainly consists, apart from a few detached poems, of prose works that will be fresh to the ordinary Wagner student; they commence with a couple of articles ('Die deutsche Oper' und 'Pasticcio') written when he was twenty-two, and end with some thoughts 'Ueber das Weibliche im Menschlichen,' that are dated February 11, 1883,—two days before his death. Some of the verses are mere doggerel jokes for his own and his friends' private consumption, and were hardly worth reprinting; but for the rest the volume is of the greatest interest.

The earlier essays show once again how slow the real Wagner was to find himself. At the beginning of his twenties he had apparently no notion of whither his genius would ultimately lead him. He waxes enthusiastic over certain aspects of Italian opera, and is very severe on German deficiencies. Song, he declares in the article on 'Die deutsche Oper,' is of the utmost importance; it is 'the organ by means of which a man can communicate himself musically.' It is second nature to the Italians, though they have abused it during the two previous decades, as the Germans have abused their learning. He talks of Bellini much as a modern opponent of Strauss might talk of Mozart: 'Never shall I forget the impression recently made on me by a Bellini opera, after I had become heartily tired of the eternally allegorising orchestral bustle, and a simple and noble melody at last appeared again.' The Germans have no national opera for the same reason that they have no national theatre: 'We are too intellectual and much too learned to be able to create warm human figures.' Weber has never understood how to handle song, and Spohr is not much better. Weber's talent, again, is too lyrical for opera, and Spohr's too elegiac. Weber's best opera is 'Der Freischütz,' because here he keeps within the sphere most suited to him—'mystical-grisly romanticism' and charming folk-melody being both within the province of the lyric. 'But look now at his "Euryanthe"! What paltry refinement in the declamation, what punctilious employment of this instrument and that to assist the expression of some word or other! Instead of giving voice to a complete feeling by means of a single bold and pithy stroke, he breaks up the impression of the whole by petty details and detailed pettinesses (durch kleinliche Einzelheiten und einzelne Kleinlichkeiten). How difficult it is for him to give life to his ensembles; how heavy is the second finale! Here an instrument, there a voice, tries to say something very clever, without knowing in the end what it says. And as everyone, when it is all over, has to confess that he hasn't understood a bit of it, people find at least some consolation in the fact that it is amazingly learned, and therefore worthy of respect. O this fatal learning, this source of all the German ills!'

'We must therefore throw over a lot of affected science, and be men; and we must not be hypocritical, but see the good there is in both Italian and French opera. We shall not have a worthy German opera until Germans learn to express the spirit of the time in the forms of the time.'

He recurs to the same theme in the 'Pasticcio von Canto Spianato.' Voices cannot be made to imitate instruments. Formerly the voice was accompanied discreetly; now it is buried beneath nonsensical instrumental 'cracklings' (Geprassel), being made, without any regard to the situation, to 'gurgle in empty figures, which are as bad for the throat as a hard nut for a blunt tooth.' He laments that 'we hardly ever hear nowadays a really beautiful and technically perfect trill, very seldom perfect mordents, or a rounded coloratura,' and so on. Composers write for the voice without understanding it, which would not be permitted in the case of any other instrument. The instruments must be 'a guard of honour' to the voice. Mozart gave the singer his rights even in the fullest orchestration; now we lower the voice to the level of an instrument. It is piquant to remember that in after years the critics lectured Wagner for just the same failings as he here attributes to the contemporaries of his youth. There is a vein of sound sense, however, running through his boyish ideas; and we get a foretaste of the future Wagner in such a remark as this: 'In an opera only one thing is needed—poetry. Words and tones are only the expression of this. Our operas are for the most part only a string of musical numbers without any psychological connection.'

In these days his taste was clearly far from being fully formed. He holds Bellini up as a model to his compatriots. He can hardly find too many good things to say of Meyerbeer, who has combined in himself the excellencies of the three musical nations, 'throwing himself into the French enthusiasm, equipped with German solidity and Italian beauty.' He rescued the French opera when it was becoming weak and conventional, and gave it a classical style. 'He wrote music as Handel, Gluck and Mozart had written it before him. These were Germans, and Meyerbeer is a German. . . . He has preserved his German inheritance,—naïveté of feeling and purity of invention.' His German nature is shown again in the religious seriousness of his works. To how much of this would Wagner have subscribed some ten years later?

Among the most interesting contents of the volume are a number of letters written to a German paper during his first residence in Paris. They are to this day quite excellent journalism; the young Wagner had a keen eye for everything that went on around him, and a swifter and lighter style than that of his later prose. Every now and then we get a glimpse of his own misery,—in the tone of mingled envy and detestation, for example, in which he speaks of the large incomes that Scribe and others make. He admires Liszt as a pianist, but has not yet learned the whole value of the man. He seems, indeed, to have been more drawn to Vieuxtemps, who came and played the violin to him one day when he was sick. He writes at some length, and almost wholly with sound judgment, on Berlioz. He lays stress upon the solitude to which that composer had been driven by the public's failure to appreciate him, and guesses that it has not been altogether good for his genius. Had he had trusty friends to tell him of the occasional defects of his 'Romeo and Juliet,' for instance, that work might have been improved. He remarks very shrewdly that it would have been none the worse for a revision by Cherubini. He fears that the public view of Berlioz as an exceptional phenomenon will take possession of the man himself, and that he will 'remain for ever incomplete, and perhaps only shine as a transient and astounding exception.' Wagner praises the 'July' Symphony highly, and speaks admiringly of Berlioz as a conductor. We get, too, an interesting side-glimpse of old Cherubini, who had ceased to be a force in musical Paris, and had passed partly out of remembrance, owing largely to the uncontrollable asperities of his temper.

Among the prose works of the later days are a long and carefully-worked-out scheme for the improvement of the Royal Kapelle at Dresden, an article on 'Artist and Critic' (à propos an attack on him by one Carl Banck), various essays on theatrical reform and on the revolution, the essay on Wilhelm Baumgartner's Lieder that is already familiar to readers of his correspondence with Uhlig, a number of metaphysical speculations that are not always as lucid as they might be, some important articles on the subject of Bayreuth, and a few 'programmatic explanations' of his works. The two volumes are, in fact, indispensable to the student of Wagner. They have been carefully and capably edited by Richard Sternfeld, and are handsomely produced, though one notices an unusual number of typographical errors. [E. N.

The adult male alto. By Dr. G. Edward Stubbs.

[The H. W. Gray Co.]

This book deals with a subject which, as the writer very truly says, 'has been unaccountably neglected not only by teachers of singing but also by writers on vocal science.' It certainly seems strange that, while the adult male alto is felt to be a necessity in all those highly-trained choirs where, as in the Established Church in this country and the Episcopal Church of America, women's voices are excluded, so little attention has been given to the question as to the proper treatment and training of this class of voice. The fact, however, is not to be denied, and the work before us will therefore be welcomed by all those who need practical guidance in this direction.

The author has not allowed his mind to be biassed by any particular theory of voice-production. He takes facts as he finds them, and gives the reader the benefit of such information and advice as are the result of his own observation and experience. Some of his facts are not only very little known, but will be found exceedingly difficult to reconcile with certain modern theories which, having the sanction of high authority, are commonly supposed to rest upon an unshakable scientific foundation. For this reason the volume may prove instructive to many besides those for whom it is specially intended.

The remarks in the second chapter on the widely-varying condition and characteristics of the alto voice of men, of which it is pointed out there are two distinct varieties, deserve careful attention; and the same may be said of the hints to choirmasters given in chapters iii. and iv. relative to the best method of selecting and training the material at their disposal. As regards the training of what Dr. Stubbs terms the falsetto-alto, which is the variety commonly met with, the main trouble is with the 'break,' and in this connection he refers to what he believes to have been the practice of the old Italian singing masters in dealing with the tenor voice. 'Their method,' he says, 'was to develop the falsetto downwards, blending it into the chest voice, and completely eradicating the break.' He adds: 'Many teachers do not believe this can be done . . but with young voices it is not only possible to eliminate a break, but even to prevent the break from putting in an appearance at all.'

In chapter v. the author combats the prevalent notion,—which, as he rightly says, has no evidence to support it,—that the exercise of the so-called falsetto voice is injurious to the chest register. Incidentally also, in giving some useful information regarding the boy-alto, he refers to the common assumption that boys who sing alto must necessarily employ the chest register—a belief which, as he points out, is equally devoid of foundation.

The last chapter seems scarcely in keeping with the rest of the work. It is occupied entirely with a new theory of voice-production (not the author's, though he is apparently inclined to approve of it), the most remarkable feature of which appears to be the singular contention that the vocal cords have little or nothing to do with voice-production! In a work otherwise so thoroughly practical and matter-of-fact it is somewhat surprising to be confronted at the close with such a theory as this.

Short Postludes for the Organ.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

By their variety of style as well as their brevity, these pieces will furnish excellent out-going voluntaries. They will prove quite effective upon organs of modest dimensions, and we believe they will meet a wide demand. The difficulty of investing such short pieces with sufficient interest has been in most cases successfully overcome. The series consists of six numbers, as follows:—'Grand Chœur' (Thomas Adams), 'Alla Marcia' (W. G. Alcock), 'Siegeslied' (Hugh Blair), 'Postlude' (William Faulkes),

'Concluding Voluntary' (Myles B. Foster), and 'Postlude' (John E. West). If the series be continued, it might be well to include some pieces of more sombre character for special seasons, the present volume consisting of bright and cheerful examples.

Modern organ composers. Edited by A. Eaglefield Hull. [Augener, Ltd.]

In collecting these pieces, Dr. Hull is contributing a large share towards the modern organist's répertoire. The style is varied, and the composers are evidently taking into account the great possibilities of our up-to-date organs. In the volumes before us the names of many well-known organ writers appear, headed by Sigfrid Karg-Elert, who is responsible for two most interesting pieces. We are also very favourably impressed with the pieces by Dr. Hull, Dr. Bairstow and Mr. A. M. Goodhart. The last-named contributed a most dainty and charming piece, which may be played upon a single soft stop. Dr. Bairstow's 'Prelude' and 'Toccata-Prelude,' and Dr. Hull's 'Variations poétiques sur un thème original' (though why not in English?) should also be specially mentioned, as should a quaint 'Voluntary in the Hyper-Phrygian Mode' (? Hypo-Phrygian) by Ernest Bullock.

PART-SONGS.

The boy. Alexander. There was an old man. Humorous part-songs for male voices. By A. Herbert Brewer.

The lass of Richmond Hill. Original setting for male voices. By A. Herbert Brewer.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Part-song writing provides a convenient outlet for musical humour and one upon which choral Societies, especially those composed of male voices, make a large demand. Dr. Brewer's latest efforts in this direction should therefore find ready acceptance, especially as they contain music as well as humour. 'The lass of Richmond Hill' is a melodious and refined setting of the famous verses by William Upton, and presents no difficulties of execution. All the above part-songs are suitable for tenor-lead, 'The boy' and 'The lass' being also adapted for altos.

PHILIP DE MONTE.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

Dear Sir,—I should be obliged if you would allow me to appeal to your readers for information respecting Philip de Monte.

I am anxious to ascertain whether there are any of this composer's works in the Kingdom other than the eight volumes at the British Museum; also whether there are any existing records of de Monte during his stay in England.

From a foreign source we know that he was a member of the household of King Philip in 1555. It is also probable that his friend Orlando di Lassus was in England at the same time, although there is no evidence obtainable—up to the present—to justify this statement.

Believe me,

Yours faithfully,

52, Warwick Park, Tunbridge Wells, January 19, 1912. W. W. Starmer.

LEGATO ON THE ORGAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

Sir,—You are doubtless aware of the persistent and assiduous practice necessary for acquiring the legato style of organ fingering, the essential characteristic of the 'king of instruments.'

Can you tell me if an action mechanically producing a legato rendering of ordinary pianoforte fingering would really be acceptable to the majority of practising organists, or whether the disadvantage entailed in the increased complexity of the key-action outweighs any benefits the scheme possesses?

The advantages of the system in its adaptation to hymn and psalm tunes are, I think, obvious, for besides obviating the labour of overcoming the difficulties of finger substitution, it greatly increases the possibilities of registration: after pressing a chord the hands are free to be employed among the draw-stops, the keys remaining down until others are pressed.

The usefulness of the system is most apparent in its application to music consisting in a progression of chords, such music forming the basis of a church organist's work.

Before proceeding to perfect the idea, I should like to be assured that it would meet with acceptance, and on that account I solicit your valuable opinion.

Yours faithfully,

Birkenhead. Simplex.

'PROLONGMENT' MECHANISM WITH THE PEDAL ORGAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

Dear Sir,—It has often occurred to me that the 'prolongment' mechanism met with in the lower keys of some types of American organs and harmoniums might with advantage be applied to the pedal-board of a pipe-organ.

It would seem that the arrangement would facilitate a freer use of the swell pedal in hymn-tunes, psalms, anthems, and passages where the intervals are too long to admit of legato playing while pedalling consecutively with the left foot.

The 'prolongment' mechanism would ensure a perfect legato effect (no matter what intervals) while pedalling with left foot and using the swell-pedal with the right foot at the same time.

Being an enthusiastic amateur, I would be interested to know whether the suggestion has been made before, and whether the professional organ-player would consider the arrangement within the bounds of legitimate pedalling—provided, of course, the player did not abuse the facility.

Yours faithfully,

190, Ebury Street, S.W. E. Page Bull.

AN ANCIENT CUSTOM.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

Sir,—The recent enthronement of Dr. Ridgeway as Bishop of Salisbury recalls an ancient custom peculiar to that city.

Having robed in the Mitre House in the High Street, near the north gate of the Close, the Bishop, preceded by the members of the Chapter, &c., proceeds to the Cathedral. On reaching the side of the square facing the Choristers' School, it is customary for the headmaster to petition the Bishop to receive an address from the choristers, and on this occasion, permission having been given. A. M. Lockwood, the 'Bishop's boy,' delivered the following congratulatory oration (written by an old chorister, Mr. A. E. Collins, of the Colonial Office) to his Lordship, in Latin :

'Right Reverend Father in Christ, on your entrance to this Close as Bishop of Salisbury, we, the scholars of an ancient School, gladly and zealously perform the duty handed down from antiquity of offering our congratulations. We have deeply deplored the loss of him of blessed memory who lately and for so many years occupied the Bishop's throne, most learned, most benevolent of men; now our being allowed to greet you on your succession to a most responsible office brings us both consolation for our grief and at this present time joy and high hope. That you, distinguished brother of distinguished brothers, of a name made famous both through the far places of Empire by an Eastern Governorship and in our own neighbourhood by the Bishopric of Chichester, yourself with long experience of a Bishop's cares in the chief of cities—we are most greatly rejoiced should be called by Salisbury's name. We wish you many honours, long life, health and happiness, and we ask your indulgence, your favour, and your blessing.'

To which the Bishop replied, also in Latin :

'I return thanks to you for receiving me so courteously and kindly. I am a sharer in your grief for the personage so dear, and I do not mourn less deeply than you that this Diocese is suffering from such a sense of loss. The issues of time to come which you wish, these I both hope and feel confident will come to pass. Many things which I would like to say to you and your colleagues I must postpone until the time when—not many days hence—I shall visit your School. That your residence here may turn out for you to be good, happy, prosperous and fortunate, and that you may add to it both honour and prosperity, I earnestly beg and beseech the Eternal God.'

The procession then continued, the choir singing the hymn 'Disposer Supreme.'

I am indebted to the Salisbury Journal for the translation of the address and the Bishop's reply.

Yours faithfully,

45, Alma Square, N.W. Edmund Rogers.

Obituary.

We regret to have to announce the following deaths :—

Mr. J. Airlie Dix, on December 8, at the age of thirty-nine years. He was famous as a composer of songs of a popular but not inartistic character, many of which obtained a great vogue. He was educated at Christ's Hospital, and held organist's appointments at Kentish Town Parish Church and St. Mark's, Old Street, E.C.

Mr. D. D. J. Barnett, on December 28, at the age of seventy years. For forty-four years he had been Professor of Music at Cheltenham Ladies' College. His father was John Barnett, the prolific composer of songs and operas, and he was also related to Mr. John Francis Barnett.

Hermann Winkelmann, on January 19, near Vienna. He was a famous Wagner singer, and created the rôle of 'Parsifal' at Bayreuth in 1882.

FRESH LIGHT ON OLD ENGLISH AIRS.

By W. H. Grattan Flood.

'EARLY ONE MORNING.'

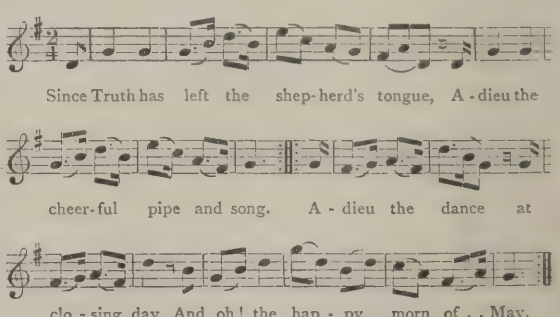
Only a few weeks before his lamented death, the late Mr. F. G. Edwards wrote to me apropos the tune of 'Early one morning,' the origin of which had baffled his researches. Curiously enough, not long afterwards I discovered what appeared to me to be a variant of the melody in a Dance Book of the year 1788. More recently I came across a much closer version, and therefore in view of the interest attaching to English folk-songs, I feel sure that any fresh light will be welcome.

In the Musical Times for April, 1904, Mr. F. G. Edwards wrote as follows on the origin of 'Early one morning' : 'The words, entitled "The maid's lamentation," appeared in "The Songster's Magazine," circa 1804, and in a collection entitled "Sleepy Davy's Garland." As in the case of so many of these old ditties the words have been modernised ; but the subject of the song is always the same—a damsel's complaint for the loss of her lover, in "The Songster's Magazine" the occupation of the inconstant swain being given as "a gentle shepherd." The music is traditional. William Chappell thought that he was the first to print it in his "National English Airs" (1838), and afterwards in his "Popular Music of the Olden Time." But Chappell was, at least, forestalled by Thomas Moore, who included the tune in Part VI. of his "Selection of Popular National Airs," dished up by Bishop and issued at the end of 1827 or the beginning of 1828. "Old English" is the designation given to the melody by Moore, who wrote words for it which begin "Hope comes again." In regard to the tune, Chappell says that it bears relationship to a hornpipe that was formerly played at the theatres.'

Mr. Kidson, in 'The Minstrelsy of England' (1901), substantially agrees with the above, and credits Moore with being the first to publish the melody. And Mr. Vincent Jackson, in his 'English Melodies' (1910), follows suit.

Acting on a clue that Moore had a copy of Crosby's 'English Musical Repository' by him when selecting his 'Popular National Airs,' I went carefully through that book—first issued in 1807—and was rewarded by finding the identical melody at page 251, under the title of 'Marian's complaint,' commencing : 'Since truth has left the shepherd's tongue.' Strangely enough this same song, words by Peter Pindar, appears, wedded to a melody by Sir John Stevenson, in the 'British Orpheus' (1811-12). Evidently the editor of the 'English Musical Repository' considered that the words of 'Early one morning' were not sufficiently elegant, and so he substituted Peter Pindar's verses. In order to show that the melody of 'Marian's complaint,' as given in the 'English Musical Repository,' is identical with that of 'Early one morning.' I append the music and words of the first verse exactly as printed in that work :

Marian's Complaint. 1811.



Since Truth has left the shep-herd's tongue, A-dieu the cheer-ful pipe and song. A-dieu the dance at clo-sing day, And oh! the hap-py morn of . . May.

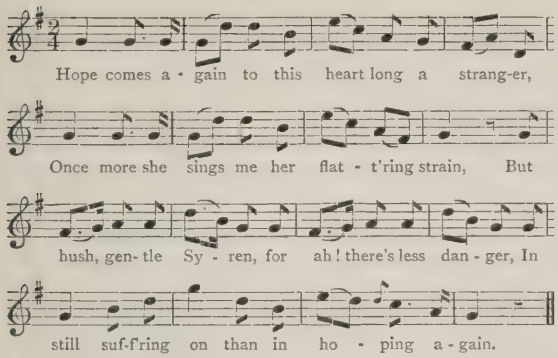
It will be seen at once that the melody is the same as the version used by Moore in 1827. I think it well to give Moore's setting, merely transposing it into the key of G for the sake of comparison with 'Marian's complaint.' There is just a very slight change in the second part in two bars, but the identity of the tune is beyond any question :

HOPE COMES AGAIN. 1827-28.



Hope comes a - gain to this heart long a strang-er, Once more she sings me her flat - t'ring strain, But hush, gen- tle Sy - ren, for ah! there's less dan - ger, In still suf-f'ring on than in ho - ping a - gain.

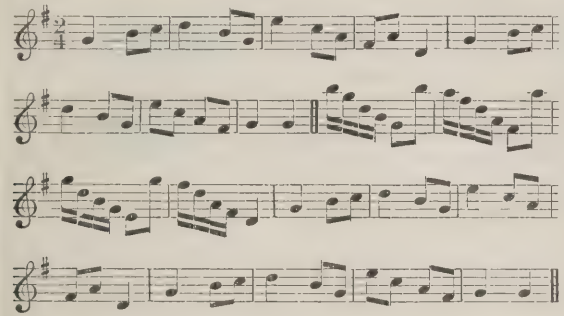
Mr. William Chappell, in 1838, says that the tune resembles 'a hornpipe that was formerly played at the theatres.' He gives no clue to the particular hornpipe, but it strikes me that the one he recollected was the dance known as 'The fortune-teller,' and published as the last tune in Thompson's 'Twenty-four Country Dances' for 1788. The first part of the dance tune is almost exactly the same as 'Early one morning,' but there is a difference in the second part. Students of folk-melody may be anxious to compare the two melodies, and consequently I append the setting of 1788:

THE FORTUNE-TELLER. 1788.



To sum up, though there is a resemblance to the melody of 'Early one morning' in 'The fortune-teller' of 1788; the earliest form of the tune is as 'Marian's complaint' in the 'English Musical Repository' of 1807, which is twenty years previous to Moore's version, and which is doubtless the source which Moore utilized—a traditional version of which Chappell noted down.

[P.S.—Since writing these notes I have had a letter from Mr. R. A. Streatfeild, of the British Museum, to whom I wrote regarding the 1807 edition of Crosby's 'English Musical Repository.' My own copy is dated 1811, but I had previously been informed that it was merely a reprint of the 1807 edition, and hence assumed that 'Marian's complaint' was in the original issue. Mr. Streatfeild now kindly informs me that the British Museum has only a copy of the 1811 issue, and therefore I wish to state the fact to remove misconception. But even assuming that the first appearance of the tune was not till the 1811 edition, this version antedates Moore's setting by sixteen years. Perhaps some reader of the Musical Times may be able to verify the statement as to the earlier appearance of the tune, but the outside cover of my copy of the 1811 edition states it is 'a new edition, with considerable additions and improvements.']

A lecture will be delivered by Dr. G. Norman Meachen on 'Malady and Melody' on February 6, at the Vestry Hall of St. Paul's, Canonbury.

INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

It is not difficult to describe the twenty-seventh annual conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, which took place at Llandudno on January 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, as one of the most successful ever carried out by this institution. The new Articles of Association, by which the members are required to be of five-and-twenty years of age and actively engaged in the practice of music as a profession, have placed the Society on the footing of an organization of weight. The note struck at the opening meeting, and sustained during the second day, indicated a laudable determination to remedy existing evils in the musical profession, and to bring about a wider degree of recognition of the right of the musicians to demand a reasonable fee for services. The whole tone of the Conference expressed a desire to assume an active attitude towards matters that are at present agitating the professional musician, and to take action on lines becoming to it as the one organization in the United Kingdom restricted to professional membership.

The proceedings opened at the Town Hall, kindly lent for the meetings by the Urban District Council, whose chairman, Mr. William Thomas, welcomed the Conference to the famous resort. Mr. J. C. Ames (London) presided, and the attendance, which numbered about two hundred and fifty, included Dr. A. H. Mann (Cambridge), Mr. W. A. Cruickshank (Burnley), Mr. W. Martin Hobkirk (Edinburgh), Dr. G. H. Smith (Hull), Mr. J. W. Pearson (Margate), Mr. W. H. Vipond Barry (Dublin), Mr. W. D. Hall (chairman of the administrative committee), Dr. W. H. Cummings (London), Mr. F. Harold Hankins (London), Mr. Allen Gill (London), Dr. E. Markham Lee (London), Mr. R. Orlando Markham (London), Mr. G. W. Bebbington (Manchester), Mr. W. A. Wrigley (Manchester), Mr. George Halford (Birmingham), Mr. Arthur Page (general treasurer), Mr. C. Morton Bailey (Llangollen), Mr. R. H. Turner (Southsea), Mr. Lewis Hann (Cheltenham), Mr. R. B. Moore (Exeter), Dr. Alfred King (Brighton), Mr. John Barrett (Bristol), Mr. James Dawber (Wigan), Mr. S. Midgley (Bradford), and Mr. A. T. Akeroyd (Ilkley).

The chairman gave a brief address which took the form of a summary of the position of the musical profession.

PROFESSIONAL STATUS.

At the present time, he said, matters connected with the musical profession were in an unsatisfactory state. This was greatly due to the methods employed in the granting of so-called professional qualifications. The education and training of a professional teacher of music should require the same time and care as that for any other calling, but unfortunately at the present time the real education of the teacher was frequently subservient to the interests of an institution granting a diploma, and it was only by the united action of the musical profession, through such a Society as theirs, that matters could be remedied. The main objects of the Society were to organize the musical profession, to provide opportunities for musicians to meet in friendly communion, and for the discussion of subjects relating to their profession, to improve and develop the culture of music among the people, and to claim for musicians legal and special recognition. The Society had done great work in the past to accomplish these objects, but owing to lack of unity among recognised institutions there was a danger of serious questions—which ought to be the special work of the musical profession—being dealt with by authorities in whose constitution the musical profession had little if any representation. One of the most important of these questions was that of registration. Other branches of education had been recognised, but the claims of the musical profession to a separate registration had been ignored. Unless an active campaign was organized for the purpose of bringing the claims of musicians before the proper authorities the registration of musicians might be placed in the hands of a body entirely foreign to its interests.

Birmingham was selected for the next Conference beginning on December 30. In the evening a reception was given to the members of the Conference at the Pier Pavilion by the Urban District Council.

A PLEA FOR RECOGNITION.

The whole of Wednesday was devoted to the discussion of various matters relating to the musical profession, which were outlined in an opening address by Mr. J. C. Ames (London). Mr. Ames first enumerated the various Societies existing in Germany, and showed that similar organizations were to be found in this country in various forms. With regard to the Incorporated Society, he said that in a measure it resembled the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musiker-Verein and had some characteristics in common with most of the German organizations, yet there were two points on which it differed. The first was that the Incorporated Society was the only Society of Professional Musicians which held examinations, and which was working steadily towards one most important point—the recognition of the musical profession in the same way as law and medicine were recognised. The social standing of the musician, he maintained, had been greatly improved in the last hundred years in England. Real reform could only come from the artists themselves, inasmuch as they could prove themselves to be, as regarded general education and knowledge, on a parity with their fellow-citizens. Some of the heads of the profession were frankly antagonistic to the Society because it conducted examinations, but he held that a body of musicians and teachers representing a vast proportion of the best teaching in the country, and one not bound up with any school or teaching institution and not using its examinations for the purpose of profit to its members, was the only body that had a moral right to examine. It was an unfortunate fact that examinations could be conducted by anybody peculiarly unsuited to the work. A plumber, or a chimney sweep, or even a burglar could if he wished constitute himself an examiner, pocket fees, grant certificates, distribute medals, or hoods. It was the removal of these abuses the Society could bring about by unity in the cause—of what the individual member could do for the Society instead of considering what the Society could do for him. Mr. Ames went on to enumerate cases of low fees, and cited an instance where a professional musician had been asked to supply an orchestra for thirty shillings, while some of the lessons worked out at a profit of two shillings and threepence for four hours' work. The case of the fees charged in the London County Council Schools was also mentioned and numerous newspaper advertisements were read, offering music lessons at sixpence. All this he put forward in support of the claim for the necessity of recognition of the musical profession. He asked them to consider what means could be adopted to remedy these abuses. He thought that through its sections the Society could do much. On the subject of Municipal Music, he asked what should be the attitude of the music profession towards these undertakings? With regard to the Provincial Festivals, he asked what part professional musicians took in the committee and management work: were they not generally neglected as a body, and should not the most important members of such committees be chosen from among local musicians and should not local forces be given preference? He mentioned the Musical League as an example of good effort in making it one of their principles to work as far as possible with local resources, and suggested that the Incorporated Society might hold out a hand to it and offer to co-operate. A resolution moved by Mr. A. T. Akeroyd and seconded by Dr. Pollit, was adopted—'That the General Council be asked to consider the advisability of sending to the Councils of Boroughs and Urban Districts a request that they should help forward the propagation of music by allowing municipal concert halls to be used at nominal fees for choral and orchestral concerts.'

WELSH FOLK-SONGS.

In the evening a paper on 'Welsh olk-songs' was read by Mrs. Mary Davies. She said her object was to enlist the sympathies of musicians in the work lately begun in Wales of rescuing from oblivion the remaining survivals of Welsh folk-song. She pointed out that the Eisteddfod had at one time given its attention to collections of folk-songs, and the collection made by Miss Williams in 1837 had been published. At the present time active work in the search for folk-songs was being carried on in all parts of the Principality. A nation which had never lost or ceased to use its native language, in spite of many and varied vicissitudes, should cherish everything that might throw light upon its past. The search for folk-songs was only a bye-path in this direction, but pursuing it the student might find treasure of value as well as of beauty. Much time and valuable material had been lost through indifference to the importance of traditional survivals, but it was not altogether too late, as had been proved during the past three years, when a good deal had been done to make up for the lack of interest taken in the work hitherto. The Lecturer's remarks were illustrated by a number of singularly beautiful airs, in which there was strong national character. They were sung by Miss Megan Evans, Mr. Powell Edwards, and Mr. Montague Borwell.

EAR-TRAINING AND MUSICAL APPRECIATION.

On Thursday evening a lecture on the above topic was given by Dr. H. W. Richards. Mr. T. Tertius Noble presided. Dr. Richards said that every child should have the opportunity of developing to the fullest extent the musical faculty with which nature had endowed him. He regarded ear-training as the foundation of all other musical study, and stated his belief that the technique of execution dominated out of due proportion. The ear-training he advocated was not only the observation of tonal elements but rhythmic shapes, cadences, discords, sequences, and the memorising of the important themes of music studied. Such work led to appreciation. He believed this course would add to the employment of teachers, especially those who hitherto had confined themselves to technical matters.

A full discussion followed, and at its close Dr. Richards was cordially thanked for his paper.

THE ORIGIN OF THE OPERA.

The last paper of the Conference was provided by Dr. M. Esposito, of Dublin, and was read on Thursday evening, with Mr. T. Tertius Noble in the chair.

Dr. Esposito, in dealing with his subject, said:

'Italy, the land of all sins, saw this thing start and her sons were the sinners. In the Middle Ages we find the custom of giving in Churches performances in action of sacred stories called "Mysteries." Little by little the popular element was introduced, and the mixture of religious and profane made these performances obnoxious and indeed sometimes indecorous.

'From that style of composition the oratorio was born. San Filippo Neri, with the intention of dissuading the people from assisting at the Carnival fêtes, instituted sacred functions which afterwards were called 'oratorios,' from the Oratory of St. Mary in Vallicella at Rome, where these performances first took place. Stories from the Bible were taken as subjects, and the music was made for chorus in four parts and short solos. The first of these functions took place in 1541, and was so successful that an Oratorio Society was formed in Rome, and its ramifications spread quickly through Italy and France.

'In 1388 a masked allegory with chorus and dances, accompanied by instruments, was performed in Milan on the occasion of the marriage of Galeazzo Sforza with Isabella of Aragon. Similar performances were given in Rome, Florence and Venice, and various dramas, cantatas, &c., of celebrated poets were given from time to time up to the year 1574.

'The Italian Renaissance was the outcome of the revival of Greek literature, science, and art; of what it accomplished we can see the results in our modern civilization. Every branch of human understanding was taken up with enthusiasm, and educated people frequently met and eagerly discussed all the wonderful things that were being created at the time in all branches of knowledge and art. A group of enthusiasts, Giovanni de' Bardi, Count de Vernio, Giacomo Corsi, Pietro Strozzi, Vincenzo Galileo (the father of the great Galileo), Rinuccini, the poet, Caccini and Peri, the musicians, formed a kind of association which was called the "Camerata," for the purpose of reviving the ancient musical declamation of Greece and applying it to the modern drama. These new methods had also been tried by another musician, Emilio del Cavaliere, born in Rome about 1550; he had been appointed in Florence by the Grand Duke as Inspector-General of the Arts and Artists. He was in close connection with the members of the Camerata and especially with Caccini, his townsman, and certainly knew all about this new style of music. He produced in 1590 a work called "The Satyr"; it was the first essay in that style, and in the same year another, called "Blindman's buff," but his most important work was the oratorio, "The representation of the soul and the body," performed in Rome soon after his death, in 1600. Each of these was represented by individuals acting on the stage, and the music was composed of solos with figured bass as accompaniment in the same way and style as Caccini. In the meantime the members of the Camerata had tried to write in this new style, but the most serious effort was the production of what is understood to be the first opera, "Dafne," libretto by the poet Rinuccini and music by Caccini and Peri. (Jacopo Peri was born in Florence in 1561 and, being of noble birth, was very intimate with Count de Vernio, in whose house the Camerata met.) The music of "Dafne" was written in the new style, following strictly all the rules laid down during the long years of discussion. The performance took place in the house of Jocopo Corsi—as Count de Vernio had at that time left Florence for Rome—the guests being only a chosen few; and Peri himself sang, accompanied on the harpsichord by Corsi. That was in 1597. The result surpassed all their expectations, and the poet Rinuccini, who had been the guiding spirit, fired with enthusiasm, decided to try a larger work and wrote a "Tragedy for Music" called "Euridice," the music of which was composed also by Peri and Caccini, and it was first performed on October 6, 1600, on the occasion of the fêtes given upon the marriage of King Henry the Fourth, of France, with Maria de Medici.

'Though the success of this opera and its new tendencies were the talk of all cultivated Italy, no other attempt was made for seven years either by Peri and Caccini or any other musician. It looked as if the reform had overstepped the point; the rules were so definite that all the music of the composers of the new style was alike, so much so that no difference could be seen between one or another. The truth is that none were geniuses, and they followed a preconceived idea, not daring to break the rules they had formulated when they essayed to revive the Greek drama. A new man brought about the desired change, Claudio Monteverde, born in Cremona about 1568, and at the time of the performance of Caccini and Peri's "Euridice" employed as viola-player at the Court of the Duke of Mantua.

'In 1607 his first opera, "Orfeo," to the libretto by Striggio, was performed before the Court.

'On August 19, 1613, he was appointed Maestro di Cappella at San Marco in Venice, where he lived the rest of his life. It was not until 1630, more than twenty years after "Orfeo" and "Ariadne," that he composed his third opera, "The rape of Proserpine," which was performed in Venice in the Palace of Girolamo Mocenigo upon the marriage of that nobleman's daughter. The success was enormous; the Venetians had never before heard such songs, choruses, dances and instrumentation.

'Up to this time all these operatic performances were given either in the palaces of the reigning princes or in noblemen's private houses; the people were completely kept out of the performances. Two artists, Ferrari (poet and musician) and Manelli (musician) had the idea of writing an opera on Monteverde's lines and performing it in a public theatre. They set to work, Ferrari writing the libretto and Manelli the music. "Andromeda" was the subject, and it was produced at the theatre of San Cassiano in Venice, in 1637, before a public audience; this was the first opera performed in public, and the result proved the turning point in the fortunes of the opera. The people were so charmed with the new spectacle that special new theatres were built for opera performances. Monteverde saw directly that this was the only path of progress for the opera and of renown for the composer, and, though no longer a young man, he worked at a new opera, "Adone," which was produced at the theatre of San Giovanni e San Paolo in 1639, which kept the stage during the autumn and the Carnival season of the ensuing year. Immediately after a new theatre was built, San Moise, and opened with his "Ariadne," followed by "Orfeo." Next year, 1641, he produced two new operas, "The marriage of Æneas with Lavinia" and "The return of Ulysses," and he finished his career the year after, 1642, with his last opera, "The crowning of Poppea," his swan-song, as in the beginning of 1643 he was no more.

'We have seen that more than three hundred years ago a new form of musical art was created under the mistaken impression of reviving Greek drama, and that its principal idea was to use music as a factor in giving more force, colour, and passion to the drama, and instead of speaking the words to have them sung; we have seen after three centuries these same principles re-established by modern composers, starting from Wagner. One may then ask: "How was it that opera during these centuries had strayed so far from the path pointed out by Monteverde and re-discovered by Wagner?" The story is a long one, and would require volumes to tell.'

The last day of the Conference was devoted to the annual general meeting of the members, at which a satisfactory report on the working of the Orphan Fund under the new management was made by Dr. W. H. Cummings. The annual banquet, held in the evening, brought the proceedings to a close.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON SCHOOL OF FOLK-DANCE AND SONG.

The attendance of sixty-five students signalized and ensured the success of this experimental winter school, directed by Mr. Cecil J. Sharp. As at the summer school, visitors came from all parts of the United Kingdom. The Retford district was again represented by Mr. T. Hercy Denman and his party. The study and practice of morris and country dances was carried on enthusiastically and indefatigably at the Council School throughout the session, with an interval that was devoted to traditional New-Year celebrations. A lecture was given by Mr. Sharp in the Picture Gallery of the Memorial Theatre on 'The meaning of the Folk-music revival' and its relation to Stratford-on-Avon. He showed to what an extent Shakespearian sentiment is imbued with the spirit of English countryside revelries, and how frequent are Shakespeare's references to traditional dances. A lecture was also given by Lady Gomme on 'Children's singing games,' of which illustrations were contributed by children of the locality.

An interesting feature of the session was the able running commentary made day by day in the columns of the Morning Post by a special correspondent. Among his illuminating comments were the following:

> The country dances were evidently designed for the display of picturesque evolution rather than complicated steps, and it is a notable characteristic of folk-dancing that, as beauty of design becomes more marked in the evolutions, the steps become simpler, while on the other hand where artistic groupings and changes are absent, the steps are developed to an extraordinarily high degree. On seeing the pretty and fanciful figures illustrated in the rounds and squares, no one can help recognising their suitability for drawing-room use, or wondering why they were allowed to disappear.
> Among the other events of the day's proceedings the practice of the sword dances was very interesting. This is a highly developed form of the morris, with exceedingly elaborate movements producing astonishing effects, as in the figure of eight, where the dancers, holding the ends of each other's swords, twist in and out among them in bewildering fashion, though every step and movement is precisely timed, and at the end produce a 'lock,' the blades being woven together in the form of a rosette. The singing games, too, were very absorbing because, apart from the charm of their simple tunes and pretty evolutions, they are full of acting, and embody a symbolism that goes to the very root of folk-lore.

A meeting of the newly-formed English Folk-dance Society was held under the chairmanship of Mr. A. D. Flower. All information as to the aims and constitution of this Society can be obtained from Miss Karpeles, 87, Westbourne Terrace, London, W.

Le Ménestrel of January 20 states that Herr Humperdinck's condition is still far from satisfactory. He has not regained consciousness, although he has had some fairly good sleep. The symptoms of paralysis still remain.

CONFERENCE ON MUSICAL EDUCATION.

A conference under the combined auspices and management of the Girls' School Music Union, the Music Teachers' Association, the Home Music Study Union, and the Union of Directors of Music in Secondary Schools for Boys, was held with much success in the handsome and commodious hall of the St. Paul's School for Girls, Hammersmith, from January 8 to 12. A reception was given on the evening of the first day, and on January 9 a lecture was given by Dr. Arthur Somervell on 'The place of music in education.' He advocated the claims of music to a larger place than it at present obtains in the educational curriculum. In the time of Elizabeth we were the most musical nation in Europe, but from that position we had descended with a rush, owing to the Puritans, to a state of musical imbecility. The Revolution completely suppressed all forms of self-expression through Art, with the exception of literature. They ought now to aim not merely at giving a musical education, but to make all education musical. All 'slums' were equally the outcome of a lack of early training in what the Greeks called mousike—the inner sensitiveness to the great rhythms and harmonies of life. What he hoped and longed to see, and hoped that their children would see, was an England responsive again to the beauty of natural existence—a period when slum-dwellings, whether for the rich or the poor, would be swept away, because all the community would realise that they were intolerable anachronisms.

Miss Kathleen O'Dowd, on the same morning, gave with attractive clearness and diction, an explanation of the Jaques-Dalcroze system of rhythmic gymnastics, and directed a small class through a very interesting demonstration of its elementary developments.

On the other mornings Mr. Stewart Macpherson gave two lectures on musical appreciation, with musical illustrations. He said it was mainly to the teachers that they had to look for implanting and deepening pure and healthy impressions in the child's mind. The prevalent idea of associating the word 'music' with playing the pianoforte was responsible for the neglect of the art in the majority of boys' schools, and for the meagre results obtained in girls' schools.

Mr. Field Hyde dealt in two lectures with ear-training and sight-singing. He said that the opinion sometimes expressed that ear-training was futile, was disproved by every teacher who had pursued it on right lines. Many useful and practical hints were given as to how the ear observation could be developed; and in the matter of sight-singing, plans of study on the movable do method were described.

A lecture on English Folk-song by Dr. Vaughan Williams was heard with much interest.

Another lecture that was very informing was given by Dr. J. E. Borland, whose subject was 'Old stringed and wind instruments.' It was illustrated by lantern-slides.

On the evening of January 12 there was a social gathering at which an excellent programme of chamber-music was given under the skilled and experienced direction of Miss Nellie Chaplin.

A report of the papers read appears in the February issue of the School Music Review.

VOICE AND SPEECH TRAINING.

The Association of Teachers of Elocution, Voice and Speech Training, held a conference upon the above subject at Bedford College, York Place, on January 15, 16 and 17, and at Portman Rooms on January 18 and 19. The reasons why the conference was thought necessary were explained by Miss Elsie Fogerty, Principal of the Association, in a weighty inaugural address. She said: 'I think it would be fair to describe the intellectual age from which we have just emerged as the age of the "written word"; a more unkind definition might be the age of "universal scribbling." It is equally true that we seem to be entering upon an age which is to be dominated by the spoken word. There lies with us the responsibility of providing that it shall not be fittingly described as the age of "universal chatter." Turn where we will, the subject of speech-training meets us. . . . We need co-operation among those qualified to teach the teachers. We need organized connection between the national life and the national standard of speech. We need a definite effort on the part of the teaching profession to place this subject where it should be educationally. It cannot remain merely in the hands of specialist teachers; but they must be qualified to render more complete assistance to those engaged in general teaching.'

Dr. Hulbert then gave an address on Intellectual Vocal and Physical Training. The second day was given up to discussion of 'The teaching of the mother tongue' with special reference to the establishment of a national theatre. Papers were read on the third day by Francis Warner on 'Training children with defect or absence of speech,' and by Dr. H. Crichton Miller on 'Stammering.' 'The relationship of speech and song' was discussed by Dr. W. Aikin, who dwelt upon the difficulty—previously remarked upon by Mr. Fuller Maitland, chairman of this session—of realising the spoken English word in song. He set out to show that the relationship between speech and song was so intimate that up to a certain point it might be said that they were identical.

On January 19 a reception was held by the Association. On January 20 teachers in Secondary Schools, Public Day Schools, &c., who were prevented by the re-opening of their schools from attending the conference, were specially invited to a meeting at which the following subjects were discussed: Speech training in Secondary Schools; Voice fatigue in teachers; School recitation; the Poetry class.

A NATIONAL SCHOOL OF MUSIC FOR WALES.

The suggestion for the establishment of a National School of Music for Wales, outlined and considered in our issue for January, was discussed on January 13 at a meeting held at the Cardiff City Hall, under the presidency of Alderman Lewis Morgan. Mr. Harry Evans said that a national institution of the kind would enable Wales to keep pace with other nations in modern musical progress. It would not, he said, interfere with the work of the University colleges; it would employ the skilled teaching of a specially-selected staff of experts and specialists; it would set up a standard examining body, and put an end to spurious concerns. Mr. D. T. Evans proposed and Mr. Thomas Evans seconded a resolution 'That this meeting is of opinion that the time has arrived when steps should be taken to establish a National School of Music in Wales, and that as a preliminary a Council should be formed to establish and control an examining committee, with power to issue certificates of merit.' Mr. W. T. Price deprecated the establishment of examining boards for the purpose of securing the necessary funds, and advocated the extension of the sphere of influence of the University colleges. Mr. Evan Owen moved and Mr. Herbert seconded an amendment 'That at an inquiry be instituted as to what steps should be taken to establish a National School of Music, and that as a preliminary step a committee be appointed to make the inquiry.' This was adopted. The original motion was abandoned, and an executive committee of forty was appointed.

London Concerts.

CHORAL CONCERTS.

'The Messiah' was performed on December 23 by the Alexandra Palace Choral Society under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill, and on January 1 by the Royal Choral Society under that of Sir Frederick Bridge. Madame Clara Butt was the contralto soloist on the latter occasion.

Madame Liza Lehmann's four new Shakespearian part-songs were sung by Mr. Smallwood Metcalfe's choir at Queen's Hall on December 18, and won an immediate success. 'When icicles hang by the wall' was encored. The choir, which was also heard in a number of madrigals, displayed continued progress. The soloists of the occasion were M. René Bohet (violinist), Madame Alice Montague, and Mr. Harry Dearth (vocalists).

The programme chosen by the Oriana Madrigal Society for their concert at Bechstein Hall on December 18 was seasonable, as it included Part V. of Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio,' a collection of Christmas carols of all nations, and some appropriate motets. Mr. C. Kennedy Scott conducted, and the singing was as usual distinguished by its refinement.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Timplipito carried off chief honours at the Russian concert of January 15. It is an instrument of percussion that can imitate the sound of its own name with tolerable success. The specimen used was brought from Russia, to take part in M. Ippolitov-Ivanov's Caucasian sketch, 'Dans l'Aoul,' which with his 'Cortège du Sardar' was performed under the direction of M. Safonoff. Its share was so insistent and pervading that the encore was necessary to obtain an idea of the music of the piece, which proved on examination to be pleasantly attractive. The 'Cortège' was stirring and elusively reminiscent. The remainder of the programme consisted of Tchaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini,' which was exceptionally well played, a delicate set of Variations for strings by Arensky, Rubinstein's fourth Pianoforte concerto, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Easter Overture.' Mr. Wesley Weyman, the pianist, was prevented by indisposition from doing himself justice.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Borodin's second Symphony, first heard in this country a few years ago, was revived by Sir Henry Wood at the Symphony concert on January 20. It is interesting rather than appealing music. Its nationalism takes a somewhat angular form, and the more forbidding elements of the subject-matter are given more attention in the development than those which convey a quiet contrast. One would have willingly heard more of the latter. The orchestral playing was less satisfactory in the Symphony than in Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel,' of which a reading of exceptional brilliance and executive perfection was given. M. Mischa Elman gave a glowing interpretation of Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto.

By an admirable performance of Schumann's second Symphony at Portman Rooms on December 18, the North London Orchestral Society confirmed its claim to be one of our best amateur organizations. Mr. Lennox Clayton, who had prepared a careful interpretation of the score, conducted with great ability. Miss Marjorie Hayward played Max Bruch's E minor Violin concerto.

Mr. Stewart Macpherson gave the introductory lecture at Miss Kimpton's first holiday orchestral concert for young people at Steinway Hall on January 8. Beethoven's second Symphony was excellently performed under Miss Kimpton's direction, Master Sigmund Feuermann played Paganini's Violin concerto in D, and Miss Gladys Garnault supplied songs. The second and last of this holiday series was given on January 15, when Mr. Percy Scholes was the speaker. Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony was the chief work chosen for explanation and performance. Feuermann played Beethoven's Violin concerto, and Miss Gwladys Roberts sang.

LA SOCIÉTÉ DES CONCERTS FRANÇAIS.

Under these auspices the Société des Concerts d'Autrefois were heard at Bechstein Hall, on January 17, in the performance of some of that old French music which they know and play so well. Campra's 'Ballet de l'Europe galante' and Féry-Rebel's 'Les caractères de la danse' exist, both for strings, wind and clavecin, it seems, only in the form of an MS. belonging to these players. Next to publishing them, the best thing they can do is to play them at every opportunity (unless there are better works still unheard), for they are delightful music, and earned a most decided success on this occasion. The rest of the programme, supplied by Mlle. Hélène Luquiens (vocalist), Mlle. Marguerite Delcourt (clavecin), M. Georges Taine (viole d'amore), M. Fleury (flute), was similarly attractive and too elaborate to give in detail.

La Société des Concerts d'Autrefois again appeared on the following evening at Æolian Hall, on the occasion of a Broadwood Concert. They played Sacchini's Ballet music from 'Le Cid,' a Suite by Stamitz, and a Suite by Christian Bach. M. Desmonts and Mlle. Delcourt played a viola da gamba and harpsichord Sonata by Handel, and M. Mondain and M. Nanny played pieces by Boismortier for oboe and double-bass. The exquisite execution for which this Society has gained a reputation was maintained without fail. Mr. Bertram Binyon provided artistic interpretations of songs.

The admirable London String Quartet gave a concert at Bechstein Hall on December 19, and provided London with a first hearing (which did not provoke a keen desire for a second) of M. Emanuel Moór's Pianoforte trio in C major (Op. 81). Herr Johan Wysman was the pianist in this and in Baron d'Erlanger's Quintet in C major; and the string players were assisted by Mr. James Lockyer as second viola in Mozart's G minor Quintet.

The London Trio, with Mr. Ivor James in the place of Mr. Whitehouse, who was still indisposed, gave a concert at Æolian Hall on January 8, and played Brahms's Trio in C minor, Op. 101, with admirable breadth and expressive significance. Signor Simonetti and Madame Amina Goodwin played Beethoven's 'Kreutzer' Sonata, and Madame Goodwin and Miss Wynefred Manby (vocalist) provided solos.

The String quartet written by British composers with the 'Londonderry air' as a basis, produced by the Hambourg String Quartet a few years ago, was performed by the Walenn Quartet at Æolian Hall on January 16, the movement by Mr. J. D. Davis being omitted. The remainder, by Messrs. Frank Bridge, Hamilton Harty, Eric Coates and York Bowen contains music that is clever in patches, but too diversified and casual in style to retain the interest after the novelty of the experiment has worn off. The programme also included Schumann's Quartet in A and (with Mr. Herbert Parsons) César Franck's Pianoforte quintet.

The 'Thursday twelve-o'clocks' were resumed at Æolian Hall on January 18, when Miss Mathilde Verne was joined by members of the London String Quartet in Mendelssohn's C minor Pianoforte trio, and songs were given by Mr. Theodore Byard.

Madame Harriet Solly, Miss Bertha Tressler, Miss Olive Bell and Miss Margaret Izard, collectively known as the Solly String Quartet, exercised as is their custom an ambitious and independent choice of music for their concert at Bechstein Hall on January 19. Vincent d'Indy's String quartet in E minor, Op. 45, and his earlier Pianoforte quartet in A were difficult to perform and interesting as a lesson in the development of the good and bad in modern music. Miss Antoinette Veluard was the pianist, and Miss Marguerite le Mans sang.

A new Sonata for violin and pianoforte by Mr. Arnold Bax was performed by Mr. Rowsby Woof and Mr. York Bowen on January 19, when the former gave a concert at Bechstein Hall. It had the composer's characteristic aloofness and sensitive, mystic imagination, and perhaps for that reason failed to strike a decided note; it is music of the kind that keeps much in reserve for a second hearing. The programme included a Scherzo by Mr. Woof, and Mr. Bowen's 'Miniature Suite' for pianoforte. Miss Victoria Fox sang, and Mr. B. J. Dale also took part.

RECITALS.

Mr. David Hochstein, M. Vladimir Resnikoff, and Miss Nora Duesberg, pupils of M. Sevick, gave violin recitals at Bechstein Hall on December 18, 19 and 20.

Mr. Richard Buhlig, the able and scholarly pianist, gave recitals at Steinway Hall on January 11, 16 and 22, at the third of which he introduced a Sonata in E, Op. 2, by E. W. Korngold, and played Schönberg's 'Drei Klavierstücke.'

Mr. Joseph Malkin showed himself an able violoncellist, with a style that was best when it was lyrical, at Bechstein Hall on January 13.

On the same afternoon little Stella Carol added further to her laurels with the sweetness, purity and natural refinement of her singing at the Crystal Palace.

On January 15 Miss Sara Silvers gave a vocal recital at Steinway Hall, with a comprehensive programme in which she showed a great advance in interpretative power. Miss Helen Henschel, who takes after her father as a vocalist inasmuch as she accompanies herself and interprets well, gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on January 16.

M. Sergei Tarnowsky, a newcomer, gave the first of five pianoforte recitals at Bechstein Hall on January 18, and displayed an attractive, virile style.

Suburban Concerts.

The Streatham Hill Choral Society's twenty-fifth concert was given on December 12, the programme consisting of Lloyd's 'Hero and Leander' and Dvorák's 'Spectre's Bride.' The well-balanced choir of 150 voices maintained its accustomed high standard, and took full advantage of the many opportunities for artistic and cultured singing. The soloists were Miss L. Evans-Williams, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Charles Tree, the very dramatic tenor solo work being admirably sung by Mr. Mullings. The accompaniments were well played by a full professional orchestra. Mr. Edwin J. Quance conducted.

The Bromley Choral Society, ably conducted by Mr. F. Fertel, gave, on December 13, an admirable performance of Coleridge-Taylor's trilogy, 'Scenes from the song of Hiawatha,' which attracted and greatly pleased a large audience. The chorus work was distinguished by its spirit and expressiveness. Solo parts were taken by Miss B. M. Crawford, Mr. Bertram Pearce, and Mr. Graham Smart.

An excellent performance of 'Elijah' was given at Woodside Hall on December 16 by the Finchley Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. H. J. Baggs. The principal solos were taken by Mrs. William Nollis, Mrs. A. W. Williams, Mr. George Foxon, and Mr. Charles Martin.

The Richmond Philharmonic Society gave the first concert of its twenty-second season at the Castle Assembly Rooms on December 19. The principal choral work was Barnett's 'Paradise and the Peri.' The second part comprised Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, Tchaikovsky's 'Elegy' for strings, and Wagner's overture 'Die Meistersinger.' The soloists were Miss M. Fielding, Miss V. Fielding, and Mr. George Foxon. Dr. C. E. Jolley conducted.

The Ealing Choral and Orchestral Society gave their first concert of the season on December 19, when Mascagni's 'Cavalleria Rusticana' and Elgar's 'The Black Knight' were the chief works. Dvorák's Slavonic Dances (Nos. 1 and 4) were also included. The soloists were Miss Carrie Lanceley, Miss Marion Battishill, Mr. John Bardsley, and Mr. Graham Smart. The choir and orchestra, numbering 160, were under the direction of Mr. Albert Thompson. The programme was carried out with great success. Brahms's 'Requiem' is being studied by this Society for the next concert, which takes place in March.

On January 12, the Harrow Choral Society gave Parts 1 and 2 of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' under the skilful guidance of the able conductor, Mr. F. W. Belchamber, the performance reaching a distinctly high standard. With an orchestra equal to the occasion, Mr. Belchamber obtained splendid results from his forces, the singing being noticeable for its precision and accuracy of pitch. The next work of this Society for the present season is Sullivan's 'Golden Legend.'

A fine performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' was given on January 13 by the Central Croydon Choral Society, the baton being taken for the occasion by the composer. The chief successes of the evening were the beautiful interpretation of the baritone part by Mr. Julien Henry, and the excellence of the orchestra led by Miss Frances G. Ison. The choir also did good work, showing intelligent grasp of the spirit of the music, and singing with feeling and expression. Miss Beatrice Overton and Mr. Hubert Eisdell, the remaining soloists, were received with enthusiasm by the audience, which occupied every available seat.

The Fulham and District Choral Society gave their twelfth concert at the Fulham Town Hall, when the concert version of German's 'Merrie England' was performed before a large and appreciative audience. The work was conducted by Mr. George Wilby, and the soloists were Miss Dorothy Cook Smith, Miss May Peters, Mr. Frank Webster, Mr. John Prout, and Mr. Oliver Greenwood. The efficient orchestra was led by Mr. Edgar Wilby, and Mr. C. A. Finlay acted as accompanist at the pianoforte.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

The last function associated with music in Birmingham in the year 1911 was the Festival Choral Society's annual Yule-Tide performance of Handel's 'The Messiah,' given on Boxing night, at the Town Hall, before a crowded assembly, principally composed of people residing in the outlying districts of the Midlands. It is on such an occasion that one hears 'The Messiah' given on festival lines; indeed, the whole interpretation will compare favourably with the best traditions, which is saying much, if one considers that this was the fifty-sixth annual performance by our premier choral Society. Dr. Sinclair again showed himself to be a master in the handling of choral forces, conducting a really magnificent performance, every number being received with extraordinary appreciation. The voices of the choristers were of delightful timbre and evenly balanced. In the way of attack, precision, and vocal technique the utmost was realised. The principals—all of whom distinguished themselves—were Madame Le Mar, Miss Mildred Jones, Mr. William Green, and Mr. Robert Radford. The organist was Mr. C. W. Perkins. London will shortly have an opportunity of hearing the Birmingham Festival Choral Society, for on February 29 they will give a performance of Bach's monumental B minor Mass, at Queen's Hall, under Dr. Sinclair's conductorship. Among the latest local musical associations is that of the Birmingham Diocesan Organists, promoted for the purpose of friendly intercourse, for interchange of information and opinion on musical matters, the reading of papers on subjects interesting to organists by members of the association, or by experts outside the association. Its president is the Lord Bishop of Birmingham, and its vice-presidents are the Rector of the Cathedral and the Rector of Birmingham. The hon. secretary and treasurer is Mr. Franklyn Mountford.

An interesting lecture on 'Old English Music,' with musical illustrations, was given by Mr. Joseph H. Adams before the members of the Vesey Club at the Masonic Hall, Sutton Coldfield, on January 9. Referring to a manuscript said to be the work of John of Fornsett in the 13th century, in which was included the celebrated composition entitled 'Sumer is y cumin in,' Mr. Adams said this was believed to be the oldest example of part-writing in existence. He also pointed out that the oldest forms of music known included the carol and the round. Both these were illustrated by the performance of 'The boar's head carol' and 'Good-night.' The artists who gave the musical illustrations were Miss Grace Page, Miss Doris Adams, Mr. Stanley Lane, and Mr. Sydney Bowker.

The Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association gave their two hundred and sixtieth concert in the Town Hall on January 20. Owing to the inclemency of the weather the attendance was very poor. The chief items on the programme were Joseph H. Adams's 'King Conor,' a ballad founded on an old Irish legend, set to music for baritone solo, chorus and orchestra, and Sir Edward Elgar's always welcome choral suite 'From the Bavarian Highlands.' Both works have frequently been given here, and Mr. Joseph H. Adams, who conducted, realised some pleasing effects, the honours falling to the choir. Mr. Charles Knowles, the well-known bass, was the only solo artist; he sang exceedingly well and was in excellent voice.

BOURNEMOUTH.

The Symphony Concerts held at the Winter Gardens during the past month have drawn good audiences, and the performances have reached their usual high standard of excellence. Mr. Dan Godfrey, adopting his customary impartial attitude, has presented us with works that are representative of various periods and schools, including symphonies by Xaver Scharwenka (C minor), Schumann (No. 1, in B flat), Schubert (the 'Unfinished'), César Franck (his solitary example in D minor), and Glazounow (No. 5, in B flat). Mention should also be made of the performance of the following interesting compositions: Beethoven's 'Coriolanus' Overture, Balfour Gardiner's 'Overture to a Comedy' (conducted by the composer),

P. A. Bowie's Overture, entitled 'Over the hills' (also conducted by the composer), Bruneau's 'L'attaque du moulin' suite, Svendsen's 'Norwegian Carnival,' Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet' Overture, Mozart's 'Figaro' Overture, and Gustav von Holst's 'Somerset Rhapsody' (conducted by the composer). The concertos—to which are appended the names of the soloists—included Dvorák's Violoncello concerto (Miss May Mukle), Max Bruch's Concertstück for violin and orchestra (Miss Marian Jay), Grieg's Pianoforte concerto (Miss Maud Agnes Winter), Vieuxtemps's Violin concerto in A minor (Mr. Hans Wessely), and Beethoven's Pianoforte concerto in C minor (Mr. Ioan Lloyd-Powell). In every case the performer was the recipient of favourable commendation.

There has not been quite such a large crop of recitals as usual, but visits have been paid by Mr. Plunket Greene, Miss Leila Doubleday, Mrs. Tobias Matthay and Mrs. Farnell-Watson (the latter artist is a Bournemouth pianist), Madame Lucile Hill and Miss Janotha; and the first week of the New Year was noteworthy for the first appearance here of Anna Pavlova, the great Russian dancer, whose performances more than realised all prior expectations.

The series of University Extension Lectures, in which Mr. T. W. Surette dealt with various examples of the great symphonies, has run its appointed course, the concluding lecture having for its subject Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' symphony. Few of those who attended the complete series can have failed to increase their knowledge and widen their outlook concerning symphonic music, and it is to be hoped that these valuable lectures, together with the no less valuable illustrations supplied by the Municipal Orchestra, will add fresh zest to Bournemouth's appreciation of that fine musical organization which is, after all, the town's principal asset.

BRISTOL.

The Ladies' night of the Bristol Madrigal Society, held on January 11 at the Victoria Rooms, was of a successful character and, under the direction of Mr. D. W. Rootham, compositions old and new were excellently interpreted. The constitution of the choir, always commendable, was better than had been the case in some years, largely owing to the help of a number of choir-boys as trebles. Seven pieces which the Society had not previously sung in public were included in the programme. These were, Sir Hubert Parry's 'Since thou, O fondest' and 'The sea hath many,' Dr. Walford Davies's 'Weep no more,' Bateson's 'Camilla fair tripp'd o'er the plain' (revised by Pearsall), 'In pride of May' (Weelkes), 'When flow'ry meadows' (Palestrina), and 'Dainty fine bird' (Orlando Gibbons). As usual on a Ladies' night there were compositions by Pearsall, who was an early member of the Society. His spirited 'All ye that love fair freedom' and beautiful 'Light of my soul' were given, and among other contributions which specially gratified were Walmisley's 'Sweete floweres, ye were too faire!' Wilbye's 'Ladye, when I behold,' Villiers Stanford's 'Corydon, arise,' and Mendelssohn's 'Verdant spring, where art thou gone'

On January 20 there was a concert at the Victoria Rooms, given by the West Bristol Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Charles Read. The soloists were Madame Charles Read and Mr. Libbis N. Burch. Mr. Johann W. Duys was the principal violinist. Max Bruch's 'Fair Ellen' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-Bon Suite' were nicely interpreted, and for the orchestra there were Schubert's 'Unfinished Symphony' and the overture to 'Semiramide.'

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

The holiday season has seriously diminished musical operations, but choral Societies are resuming work and before long results may be expected in various directions. The Guildhall Choir, conducted by the borough organist, Mr. H. Moreton, closed the last week of the old year by giving two performances of 'The Messiah' on December 30. The choir approached perfection in points of balance and tone-quality, and in performance certainly equalled anything they had previously done. The Misses Christine Bywater and Joan Ashley, and Messrs. Cynlais Gibbs and Joseph Farringdon, were an excellent quartet. The band was unsatisfactory both in quality and attack, though some solo effects were good. The Glee Club of Plymouth College, directed by Herr C. T. Kühne, participated largely in the annual concert on December 18, singing carols and pieces by Barnby, C. T. Kühne, Stevens, Reay and Macirone. A String quartet by Mozart was artistically played by four old boys, who were joined by others as instrumentalists in some orchestral pieces, and solos and songs completed the programme. The Catholic Philharmonic Society (band and choir of seventy performers) is only in its second year of existence, but it proved itself an artistic and capable body on December 19, in an enjoyable performance of Mozart's 'Twelfth Mass,' conducted by Mr. Albert Doyle. The choir was specially refined in tone and accurate. The late Emmanuel Choral Society has been developed into a wider combination under the name of the Mannamead Vocal Association, conducted by Mr. Reginald Waddy. With larger scope the voices have developed all their former good features, and when they sang a programme of Elizabethan madrigals, &c., on December 19, they gave unqualified pleasure by the excellence of their performance.

At the second symphony concert of the season, given by Mr. J. W. Newton at Stonehouse on December 19, the Symphony was 'From the New World.' Miss Janie Crews made a good impression by a masterly performance of the first Concerto of Liszt for pianoforte and orchestra. At a violin and pianoforte recital at Plymouth on January 18, Messrs. Percy Lowman and Harry Lake played a three-movement Sonata by Sjörgen, which had not previously been heard in Plymouth. It proved interesting, but the performers failed to make sufficient contrast in the tempi and characters of the several movements. Mr. Lake played pieces by Debussy, MacDowell, Chaminade and Liszt, and Mr. Lowman contributed the first movement of the Tchaikovsky Concerto for violin and some of the Kreisler resuscitations.

On December 19, a new organ was opened at St. Luke's Church, Devonport, by Mr. W. Lamble.

An operetta, 'Rumpelstiltskin,' was performed at Crownhill on December 19, under the stage-management of Mrs. Coryndon Matthews, the children having been trained by Mrs. Hall Parlby and Miss Vigne, with the assistance of Miss Blight and Mr. Ball (pianoforte and violin).

Through the enterprise of Messrs. Moon & Sons, Madame Clara Butt and party visited Plymouth on January 17.

At the annual meeting of the Three Towns Choral Union on January 16, Mr. R. Manley Martin was re-appointed conductor, with liberty so select his own organist, subject to the approval of the incumbents of the churches used for the festival services, which were decided to be held in July, 1912. The Rural Dean, the Rev. N. N. Lewarne, was elected president, and the financial statement was satisfactory.

DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

Messrs. Walter L. Twining and H. E. Crocker have been appointed honorary conductors of the Torquay Musical Association, in the place of Mr. Henry T. Webb, resigned. The Isca Glee Quartet contributed to a concert at Dawlish on New-Year's Day; and an excellent concert was given at Buckfastleigh on January 3 by Miss Ruby Davy, Mrs. W. Hamlyn, Mrs. Rea, Miss de la Côte, and Messrs. C. G. Pike, Reynolds, and Edgcombe. The choir of Ashwater Church was augmented on January 4 for a good performance of the cantata 'The Nativity of Christ' (Simper).

A party of artists on tour, including M. Sapellnikoff (pianist) and Miss Gertrude Lonsdale (contralto) gave a concert at Exeter on December 15, and on January 19 Madame Clara Butt and party visited the city.

CORNISH TOWNS.

Quite a number of events took place on New-Year's Day. Germoe Male-voice Choir gave a concert at Carleen, conducted by Mr. J. Pryor; Calstock Wesleyan Choir sang the cantata 'The Light of ages,' the sixty voices being conducted by Mr. W. Bickle; in Looe Wesleyan Church a choir of fifty voices sang the cantata 'Faith,' Mr. J. Mutton conducting; and the Praze Apollo Glee Choir, conducted by Mr. W. White, contributed to a concert at Praze.

Also on New-Year's Day an organ recital was given in Longstone (St. Mabyn) Church by Mr. Percival Perry (Stonehouse); and on January 3 a concert was given by the Goversneth (Nanpean) String Band. Messrs. Percy Lowman and Harold Lake gave violin and pianoforte recitals in Falmouth on January 9, and St. Austell on January 10, conducted by Mr. H. Oliver. Torpoint String Band gave a performance of popular pieces on January 15, and the St. Austell Orchestral Band gave a similar event on January 16. St. Austell Male Quartet contributed to a concert at Bugle on January 17, when the Primitive Methodist Choir gave miscellaneous items.

DUBLIN.

On December 18 the Dublin Orchestral Society gave the fifth and last concert for the 1912 season at the Gaiety Theatre. There was a good audience. The programme included Mozart's Symphony in E flat, Goldmark's 'Sakuntala,' a 'Berceuse' by the conductor (Dr. Esposito), and a Wagner selection.

The Royal Dublin Society Chamber Music Recitals were resumed after the Christmas holidays, on January 7, when the Wessely Quartet and Dr. Esposito provided the programme:—Mendelssohn's Op. 44, No. 2, in E minor; Brahms's violin and pianoforte Sonata, Op. 78; and Dvorák's Quintet, Op. 81. On January 14, Dr. Brodsky, Herr Carl Fuchs and Dr. Esposito played the following programme:—Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, Brahms's Sonata in A, Op. 100, and Beethoven's Trio in B flat, Op. 97.

On January 21 the Marie Motto Quartett played Schumann, Op. 41, No. 3; Haydn, Op. 74, No. 3; and Dvorák in E flat.

On January 19 the Quinlan Opera Company concluded a successful season of four weeks at the Theatre Royal with a performance of Verdi's 'Requiem' and a miscellaneous programme. The choir of the Dublin Oratorio Society (conductor, Mr. Vincent O'Brien) assisted the choir of the company in the 'Requiem,' which was conducted by Mr. Tullio Voghera. The soloists were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Edna Thornton, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Hinckley—Miss Nicholls's singing was the outstanding feature of the performance. 'The Valkyrie,' done for the first time in Dublin, proved a strong attraction and brought large audiences on the three occasions on which it was performed. Mr. Robert Parker was an extremely fine Wotan, and Miss Edna Thornton made a great success as Fricka.

The Sunday Concerts were resumed on January 21, when Dr. Esposito conducted Haydn's Symphony in D. Mr. Gerald Murphy (tenor) and Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees ('cello) were the soloists.

EDINBURGH.

At the seventh of Messrs. Paterson's orchestral concerts, given in the McEwan Hall on December 26, Madame Kirkby Lunn was the vocalist, and delighted the audience with her superb singing of Mozart's 'Non più di Fiori,' from 'La Clemanza di Tito.' The orchestral numbers included the 'Tannhäuser' overture and Schumann's Symphony No. 4, in D minor.

The special feature of interest at the eighth concert, on January 8, was the first appearance in Edinburgh of M. Paul Kochanski, a young Russian violinist, who created a very favourable impression by his performance of the solo part in Tchaikovsky's Concerto in D major. He possesses a splendid technical equipment, produces a tone of exceptional beauty and power, and with a few more years of experience should take a high place in the rank of living violinists. The orchestral works comprised Haydn's Symphony in C, Strauss's tone-poem 'Don Juan,' and Dvorák's 'In der Natur.'

At the Queen's Hall, on December 18, Mr. James Sneddon gave an interesting lecture on 'Rare old Scottish songs.' The lecturer dealt with love songs, domestic songs, and romantic and incidental songs. Examples of the individual types were admirably sung by Mr. Sneddon and Miss Maie Thom.

Before a crowded audience, Mr. Moonie's Choir gave their annual performance of the 'Messiah' in the McEwan Hall on December 23. The soloists were Miss Norman M. Snowball, Miss Nina Horsburgh, Mr. W. H. Oldham, and Mr. Robert Burnett. Mr. Winram's string orchestra, with Mr. J. Curle at the organ, provided the accompaniments.

The Royal Choral Union (conductor, Mr. T. H. Collinson) gave their forty-ninth annual performance of the 'Messiah' in the Music Hall on January 1, with the following soloists: Madame Mary Conly, Miss Alice Lakin, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Charles Knowles. Mr. James Winram led the orchestra, and Mr. Gavin Godfrey presided at the organ. An excellent performance of the 'Messiah' was also given by the Leith Choral Society (conductor, Mr. W. S. Abbott) in the Assembly Rooms, Leith, on December 27.

GLASGOW.

Under Mr. J. M. Diack the Bach Choir sang an abridged form of the 'Christmas Oratorio' in St. Mary's Cathedral on December 18. The notable features of the performance were the Choir's intelligent phrasing in the choral numbers, the reverent rendering of the Narrator's part, and the remarkably artistic playing of the organ accompaniment by Mr. G. T. Pattman, the organist of St. Mary's Cathedral. At the sixth classical concert on December 19 the Choral Union gave 'Elijah,' under the direction of Mr. Henri Verbrugghen. As a choral performance the work lost somewhat in dignity by reason of some unusual, and one might say unwarrantable, changes of tempo, but both choir and orchestra responded well to the conductor's demands. The solo vocalists were Madame Mary Conly, Misses Jenny Young and Doris Woodall, and Messrs. Maurice D'Oisly and Frederic Austin. Of these Miss Woodall's performance of the contralto music merits special praise. Mr. A. M. Henderson acted as organist.

Mr. Verbrugghen's excellent playing of the solo part in Bach's Concerto for violin and strings in A minor, and Madame Kirkby Lunn's dramatic rendering of Saint-Saëns's ballad, 'La fiancée du timbalier,' were the notable features of the seventh classical concert on December 26. Christmas Eve falling on a Sunday may possibly account for the unusual musical activity in the churches. In any case there were few churches in which more or less elaborate 'services of praise' were not given, the music performed ranging from Christmas carols to fairly complete 'Messiah' selections. According to time-honoured custom, the Choral Union gave the 'Messiah' on New Year's Day, and repeated the performance to a 'popular' audience on January 11. What has been said regarding Mr. Verbrugghen's reading of 'Elijah' applies, but in a less degree, to the 'Messiah.'

The ninth classical concert on January 2 brought to a first hearing here a highly-attractive orchestral arrangement of Russian folk-songs by Liadoff. In this and in the 'Eroica' Symphony the Scottish Orchestra played magnificently. Madame Donalda made an excellent appearance as solo vocalist. A special interest attaches to the tenth classical concert on January 9, as witnessing the first appearance in this country of Mr. Paul Kochanski, a young Russian violinist of remarkable gifts, whose playing of Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto in D evoked great enthusiasm. Mr. Kochanski's second appearance at the Saturday Popular Concert on January 13 brought together one of the largest audiences this season. Another stranger, in the person of Mr. Alfred Hoehn, appeared at the eleventh concert on January 16. Mr. Hoehn, who won the Rubinstein Prize in Rome in 1910, possesses a technical equipment of the highest order, and this was exemplified especially in the solo part of Rubinstein's Pianoforte concerto No. 4, in D minor. The programme also included Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony, and a novelty, viz., the Introduction and Wedding-march from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, 'The golden cock.'

On January 12 Pollokshields Philharmonic Society gave a highly praiseworthy performance of Elgar's 'Caractacus.' The choruses were sung with vigour and freshness, and the whole interpretation of the work reflects the greatest credit on the conductor, Mr. John Cullen, who, with sincere and general regret, now severs his twenty years' connection with the Society. The solo music was in the safe hands of Miss Ada Forrest and Messrs. Maurice D'Oisly, Herbert Brown, and Robert Charlesworth, and the accompaniments were played by the Scottish Orchestra.

Among other events of the month were a successful recital by Madame Curzon-Watt, a gifted local pianist, and the Western Amateur Orchestral Society's concert under Mr. John Mactaggart.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

A lengthy selection from Berlioz's 'L'Enfance du Christ' was performed by the Philharmonic Society at their Christmas concert on December 19, when it appeared that time has removed a good deal of the freshness of the work, of which the composer wrote that all the press chanted Hosannas in every key when it was first heard, sixty years ago. The performance in question carried no conviction, nor did it impart any special sense of the naive mysticism of the work. It was a performance in which the honours fell to the instrumentalists rather than to the vocal soloists or the choir. The chief impression was made by the exquisite playing of the quaint Serenade for harp and two flutes by Messrs. Collier, Needham and Redfern. After the interval Mr. Frederic Cliffe's 'Ode to the North-east Wind' came as a welcome tonic. A spirited performance was given of this picturesque choral work. Dr. Walford Davies's 'Solemn Melody' for orchestra and organ (Mr. Branscombe) also made a favourable impression. The soloists included Miss Emily Breare, Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Ivor Foster, and Mr. Harry Dearth. Sir Frederic Cowen conducted.

The programme of the seventh Philharmonic Concert on January 9 was mainly devoted to Sir Edward Elgar's music, represented by his first Symphony in A flat, Op. 55, and the Violin concerto, Op. 61, in which Mr. Kreisler played the solo at this third performance of the work in Liverpool and the first at these concerts. It is not necessary, or indeed possible, to say anything new with regard to either the Concerto or the Symphony, except to record the consciousness of added pleasure which each successive performance gives. In the Symphony especially there is a grandness of manner, a sustained energy of invention, and a melodic inspiration only to be found in music which reaches to the greatest heights. Conducted by Mr. Landon Ronald, the symphony did not fail in any particular of its beauty and solace. The same may be said of Mr. Kreisler's performance of the Concerto, to him a familiar task. His vision of the inner meaning of the music has the perception of the true artist interpreted by the skill of the virtuoso. The remaining items of an interesting programme were somewhat overshadowed by the Elgar music, with one notable exception, Sir Hubert Parry's masterly choral ode, 'Blest pair of Sirens,' of which a worthy performance was given. An unrehearsed incident of the Concerto was the rapid exchange of instruments made between the soloist and Mr. Rawdon Briggs, leader of the orchestra, owing to a string breaking on the solo violin.

Handel's 'Messiah' was sung by the Liverpool Choral Society (formerly known as the Methodist Choral Union) on December 26, under the direction of Mr. Percival Ingram, with Miss Gertrude Blomfield, Miss Miriam Scarborough, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Hamilton Harris as vocal principals. Mr. Ingram may be commended—with, perhaps, some reservations,—for his adherence to conventional readings of the choruses. The female voices are not only numerically stronger than the tenors and basses, but excel in freshness and vigour of tone. Apart from this disparity, the singing of the familiar music was intelligent and generally creditable.

Another 'Messiah' performance deserving note was given by the Port Sunlight Philharmonic Society in the spacious auditorium at Port Sunlight on December 21, conducted by Mr. F. H. Seddon, the musical director for Messrs. Lever's great works. A band and choir of 350 was made up by the help of contingents from leading local choral societies, and the singing was marked by a degree of precision and also expression very commendable in singers not regularly rehearsing together. The soloists were Miss Violet M. Brown (a very young soprano), Miss Eva Sparkes, and Messrs. T. Barlow and Arthur Weber. A novelty at a 'Messiah' performance was the speech in humorous vein made by Sir W. H. Lever during the interval.

At the annual concert of the Claughton and Oxton Choral Society in the Claughton Music Hall, Birkenhead, Elgar's 'Coronation Ode' was excellently sung under Dr. Reynolds's direction, with Miss Sara Silcock and Mr. S. Mann as solo vocalists. A small orchestra, with Miss Darbyshire (pianoforte), and Mr. R. E. Parker (organ), provided efficient accompaniments. The singing of Dr. Reynolds's 'prize' anthem, 'For all the Saints,' composed for the recent Festival of the Liverpool Church Choir Association, was also an interesting and successful item of the programme.

The sixth musical evening of the Rodewald Concert Club was held on January 15, when two prominent young local musicians, Mr. Douglas Miller (pianoforte) and Mr. Vivian Burrows (violin), collaborated in a performance of the 'Kreutzer' Sonata. Mr. Miller, who is a pupil of Godowsky, introduced three interesting novelties in his pianoforte solos, viz., 'Dimanche de Paques' (Rhené-Baton), 'Aus meinem Tagebuch,' No. 4 (Max Reger), and Prelude, Op. 23, No. 5 (Rachmaninoff). Tenor songs, accompanied by Dr. James Lyon, were agreeably sung by Mr. Lloyd Moore. There was an unusually large attendance of members and friends.

A feature of the Christmas season was the unmistakable success of the performances in the New Repertory Theatre of Judge Parry's musical play for children, 'Katawampus' with incidental music by Norman Hayes, who makes effective use of old English melodies.

The Moody-Manners Opera Company paid a week's visit to the Birkenhead Theatre Royal, commencing January 15, during which this excellent combination presented a series of familiar operas in English. The occasion was notable as being the first time such a large and well-equipped opera company has appeared in Birkenhead.

Subscribers to and guarantors of the scheme for the forthcoming operatic Festival of six nights and one matinée, commencing March 11, in the Shakespeare Theatre, Liverpool have been informed that Mr. Ernst Denhof has arranged with Mr. Michael Balling to conduct the performances of the Wagner operas and Gluck's 'Orpheus.' Richard Strauss's 'Elektra' will be conducted by Hofkapellmeister F. Cortolezis, of the Munich Royal Court Opera House.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

Whilst the second half of the Hallé series bids fair to equal, and possibly surpass, the earlier portion in sustained interest, there is no gainsaying the fact that opera will give the spring musical season its greatest distinction. Messrs. Denhof and Quinlan report favourably upon the financial results of their respective ventures during 1911. Thus emboldened, the former promises 'Elektra,' 'Die Meistersinger,' 'Tristan und Isolde,' 'Flying Dutchman,' and Gluck's 'Orpheus'; and the Quinlan season next autumn will include 'Louise,' 'Boris Godounov' by Moussorgsky, and Offenbach's 'La belle Hélène,' in addition to more established favourites. This revival of operatic enterprise, coupled with the present movement for theatre-building, is a tolerably safe indication that the day is not distant when opera will be established permanently in our midst. Just as there was potentially a serious theatre-going public when Miss Horniman started her Repertory Company here—a public which in its turn became propagandist—so I believe will our opera-going public come into existence. The young Manchester Musical Society might do much worse than establish an Opera-goers' Club, somewhat on the lines of the Playgoers' Club (in Manchester mustering 700 members), which has done so much to focus the aims and ideals of lovers of the serious drama.

All will regret the enforced absence of Madame Agnes Nicholls from the coming series of Wagnerian dramas, but this will allow us to become acquainted with the stagecraft of Miss Perceval Allen. Madame Marie Brema, too, will be warmly welcomed in 'Elektra'; the two conductors alone are sufficient guarantee in themselves for the excellence of the performances.

Last month I omitted mention of the performance by the Manchester Nonconformist Choir Union, under Mr. Granville Humphreys, of portions of Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio,' sung by a small choir of approximately fifty voices to pianoforte accompaniment. After the Christmas recess, music did not get into really full swing again until the middle of January.

Probably no programme yet given by Mr. Simon Speelman at the Saturday 'Proms' has presented so many points of freshness as the opening one of the year on January 6. It included Strauss's early Violin concerto and an Adagio by Sinding, played by Mr. Arthur Catterall; the Aubades of Lalo; a rarely-heard Tchaikovsky song given by Miss Marion Beeley—a Manchester contralto who recently sang Erda's music in the Ring dramas under Schalk at Covent Garden—and the concert closed with Boieldieu's overture 'La dame Blanche,' which does not appear to have been played in Manchester since the first year of the Hallé concerts, now fifty-four years ago!

At the concert on January 11, Madame Clara Butt, Mr. Kennerley Rumford and Miss Tina Lerner supplied the programme. More finished pianoforte-playing than Miss Lerner's has not been heard in Manchester for a long time. At a Brodsky Quartet concert about the same period she played with fine nobility in the great Tchaikovsky A minor Trio; altogether her art in its numerous aspects is worthy to stand beside that of the best lady-pianists in the last twenty years. Mr. Joseph Malkin, of Berlin, also played 'cello solos.

Mr. Landon Ronald's programme at the twelfth Hallé concert had abundant interest for the taste of practically every phase of music-lovers, except Wagnerians. Willy Hess introduced Max Bruch's latest Violin Concertstück, and Gustav von Holst's 'Somerset Rhapsody' gave unaffected delight to the great majority of the audience. Mr. Landon Ronald scored his great triumphs in Tchaikovsky's third Suite (Op. 55) and Strauss's 'Don Juan.' For real eloquence and virility of conception his reading of the latter work has not been surpassed in Manchester.

The first performance of Bantock's 'Atalanta in Calydon' occurred too late to be dealt with in this issue; three rehearsals weekly have been the orders for the choir so far this year, the composer taking charge in the final week.

The Gentlemen's Concert, on January 15, enabled the Manchester public to realise, probably for the first time, the real significance and greatness of the work being done amongst the girls of Ancoats by Miss Say Ashworth. Ten years ago she started with absolutely raw material; perseverance and a constant pursuit of the highest ideals have enabled her to raise a choir which on this occasion was well worthy of association with Sir Henry Wood, and of the honour of giving 'for the first time in Manchester' a performance of Debussy's 'Blessed Damozel.' There is food for much thought in this juxtaposition of Lancashire mill-girls, Dante G. Rossetti's 'Blessed Damozel' and Debussy's elusive music. What was the power that enabled these comparatively untutored girls to give us the very quintessence of such subtle music? Why should they succeed where more cultured folk entirely miss their way? Sir Henry Wood assured the present writer that it was the most beautiful performance in its absolute truth and rightness that he had yet conducted. Miss Ada Forrest took the principal solo part with much distinction, that of the Narrator being sung by Miss Myra Dixon (like the choir, also a product of the competitive festival movement) with great beauty of tone. Some choral works by Berlioz, Brahms and Elgar were also heard.

A varied and interesting programme was given at the Musical Society's meeting on January 12. A quartet consisting of Mr. Felix Berlyn and the three brothers Cingarelli gave an interesting new work by Scontrino, a professor of theory at the Academy of Music in Florence. Later they were joined by Mr. Mudie in Dvorák's Quintet. Vocal relief was found in songs performed by Mr. Hamilton Harris, and a couple of new part-songs by Mr. Mudie sung by a small choir.

Mr. Herbert Whittaker appears to be quietly and effectually changing the character of the soloists' work at the concerts of the Manchester Vocal Society, in much the same manner as he did in the choral work. At the concert on January 17 there was scarcely one item of insignificant artistic worth. The main choral items were drawn from Bach, Parry, Elgar, and Bantock.

The Tuesday 'lunch hour' organ recitals at the Cathedral still draw big crowds of business men, who can be 'On 'Change' two minutes after leaving the recital. Sir Walter Parratt came on January 16, his programme consisting mainly of organ arrangements of music composed for either orchestra or other instruments, but at least three items were bona-fide organ music.

NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

'King Olaf' was performed by the Tynemouth Amateur Vocal Society on December 13, with Miss Ada Forrest, Mr. Joseph Reed and Mr. G. Parker as soloists. Mr. M. Fairs conducted, and there was a full orchestra. The Philharmonic Orchestra showed a distinct advance at their concert on December 14, and made a good impression with an ambitious programme. Glazounow's sixth Symphony, tuneful, vigorous, clever, interesting, but not great music, and William Wallace's beautiful and spiritual symphonic poem, 'The Passing of Beatrice,' were the novelties. Mozart's 'Haffner' Serenade, Beethoven's 'Leonora' No. 3, Smetana's 'Bartered Bride' Overtures, and Sibelius's 'Finlandia' completed the programme. Mr. E. L. Bainton conducted with skill.

On Friday, January 19, the Société des Concerts d'Autrefois visited the Classical Concert Society and gave a programme of old-time music. Campra, Couperin, Boismortier, Rameau, Rousseau, Handel, Marcello, Sacchine, and J. C. Bach were laid under contribution, and very delightful proved some of the old French ballet music of the earlier writers. A number of songs were sung with splendid vivacity and typically French abandon by Mlle. Luquiens.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company paid a fortnight's visit to the Tyne Theatre, beginning on January 15, and performed mostly time-honoured works, with Goldmark's 'The Queen of Sheba' as a quasi-novelty.

NORWICH AND DISTRICT.

The first concert of the season of the Norwich Philharmonic Society, under the conductorship of Dr. Bates, was held at St. Andrew's Hall, on Thursday, December 21, when Mozart's Symphony No. 35, in D minor, and Sir Edward Elgar's 'King Olaf' were given. The principals engaged were Miss Ada Forrest, Mr. Harold Wilde, and Mr. Campbell McInnes. The choir consisted of the Norwich Choral Society. The concert was very largely attended, and excellent interpretations were given.

The Saturday Popular Concerts, under the direction of Dr. Bunnett, had a successful autumn season, and the first concert of the New Year was held at St. Andrew's Hall on January 6, when Miss Kate Rooney and Mr. Knyvett Wilson were the vocalists. Mrs. W. Waters gave some excellent recitations. The attendance was very satisfactory.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

A highly interesting ecture was given at the University College on December 21, on the 'Musical poems of Browning,' by Mr. T. Henderson. Illustrations were provided, and formed a principal feature. Miss Cantelo played pianoforte solos, including a Sonata in A major by Galluppi, and, assisted by Miss Baxter and Miss Vowles, a Trio in E minor by Avison. The college choir were responsible for the choral numbers, including Byrd's 'Non Nobis,' Palestrina's 'I will give thanks,' and Mendelssohn's 'The nations now are the Lord's.' Miss Doris Jones recited 'A Toccata of Galuppi's' (Browning).

On Boxing-day the usual performance of 'The Messiah' was given by the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society. The solos were undertaken by Miss Gladys Honey, Miss Maude Wright, Mr. Gwynne Davies and Mr. Watkin Mills. Mr. F. Wyatt rendered valuable service at the organ, and Mr. Mark Hemingway was solo-trumpet.

Despite the weather many gathered to hear Miss Bisiaux's concert on January 16, when she selected works by Kreisler, Bach and Cyril Scott. She was ably supported by Mr. Marsh Hopewell, whose pianoforte solos included works by Chopin, Liszt and MacDowell.

The last of the Lecture Concerts at the University College took place on January 18, when the subject was Dvorák. Mr. Allen Gill gave a short sketch of his life and works; and emphasised his remarks by a very interesting programme. Miss Carrie Tubb sang four folk-songs, and the 'Gipsy songs' in a most charming style. With Mr. Bernard Johnson at the pianoforte, Mr. Mountney (violin), and Mr. Edwin Thorpe ('cello), a fine performance of the Adagio and Finale from the Pianoforte trio was given; and the whole of the Pianoforte quintet was also given, with Miss Una Truman (2nd violin) and Mrs. Marshall (viola). The artistic result was encouraging in the highest degree, and it was a pleasure to hear that these players intend to be heard together in chamber music in future seasons. As the city has no opportunity to hear such music since Miss Cantelo gave up her concerts, this news was very welcome.

YORKSHIRE.

In this part of the world it is the custom to indulge at Christmas in a surfeit of 'Messiah,' and then to turn to a season of pantomime by way of a corrective. The result is that all serious music is at a discount, and there is very little that deserves a chronicle. The most interesting event that has occurred so far has been a concert of the Leeds Quartet on January 10, at which a work was given by a composer who it is said had not previously appeared on any English programme. This was a String quartet by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, an Italian musician born in 1882, who studied at Milan, and has settled down in that Mecca of composers, Vienna. This Quartet in G minor is his eighteenth work, and it shows a thorough musicianship, being admirably suited to the instruments for which it is designed, and finished in workmanship. The ideas, too, are spontaneous and pleasant, and the attitude of the composer is on the whole towards the pictorial aspect of art, more especially as regards the first movement, styled 'Nocturne,' which is nearly as long as the other two movements put together. It has great charm of mood and an atmosphere as vague and poetical as that of a moonlight night. The next movement, an 'Arietta,' is unambitious, genial, and refined, while the 'Epilogue,' which ends the work, is full of fiery energy. It is varied by references to the preceding movements, which are so altered in character that, though recognisable, they are in harmony with their brighter surroundings. The Quartet made a distinct impression, and was very sympathetically played by Mr. Cohen, Mr. Thorpe, Miss Simms, and Mr. Hemingway. With Mr. Herbert Johnson as pianist, two other highly interesting modern works were introduced, Smetana's free and brilliant Trio in A minor (Op. 15), and Dohnányi's Quintet in C minor, a remarkable 'Op. 1' in its finished style. At the Leeds Musical Evening on January 16, Sir Frederick Bridge lectured on Milton's 'Comus,' and with the help of a little string orchestra, a choir of ladies, and three young ladies as soloists, all from the Messrs. Haddock's College of Music, gave the music which he has collected and edited for the Masque—the original songs by Henry Lawes, the 'overture' and dances by old English composers: Bull, Byrd, Farnaby, Jenkins, and William Lawes. It was a very interesting exposition of old-world music, and was enlivened by the intimate and genial manner of the lecturer. On the following evening Mr. Edward Elliott, a Leeds violinist, gave a chamber concert at which several compositions new to Leeds were produced: a Serenade of a studiously old-fashioned type for flute, violin and viola by Max Reger, Debussy's first Rhapsody for clarinet and pianoforte, and a brilliant and interesting Suite by York Bowen for flute and pianoforte.

The Bradford subscription concert on January 12 consisted of a vocal recital by Miss Agnes Nicholls and Mr. Campbell McInnes, with violin solos by Mr. Achille Rivarde, who played Bach's 'Chaconne' in finished and artistic style. The songs included some very old ones, notably a number translated from 'Lute Tablature' by Mr. Frederick Keel, and a series of songs from Graham Peel's 'Country Lover' cycle, while Strauss's 'Wiegenlied,' most charming in itself, served also to display the consummate art of Miss Nicholls, and of Mr. Hamilton Harty at the pianoforte. On January 15, the first of a second series of free chamber concerts, seven in number, which have been organized by Mr. S. Midgley, and financed by a few wealthy music-lovers in the town, took place. With the aid of Miss Ada Sharp as violinist, and Mr. Drake as violoncellist, good performances were given of Pianoforte trios by Beethoven (D, Op. 70, No. 1), Schumann (D minor, Op. 63), and three movements from Hiller's Serenade trio (Op. 186). Mr. Charlesworth George was the vocalist, and sang most sympathetically songs by Schubert, Brahms, Sibelius, and others.

The Huddersfield subscription concert on January 9 was given up to Madame Clara Butt's concert party, which included Mr. Kennerley Rumford, Mr. Frank Merrick as pianist (whose variations on a Somerset song were very charming), and Mr. Charles Barré as violinist. The programme was of more interest than is usual at these miscellaneous concerts.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ABERDEEN.—The University concert given on December 12 was as usual distinguished in quality, and highly creditably carried out. Stanford's 'The Witch,' Elgar's 'As torrents in summer,' and Colin Taylor's 'The three ships' were in the choral programme; Elgar's fourth 'Pomp and Circumstance' march, Rachmaninoff's 'Prelude,' and Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' overture were among the orchestral items. Solos were given by Miss Amy V. Burnett. Professor Sanford Terry conducted.

ABERFELDY.—Sullivan's Festival Te Deum was well performed on December 29 by the Choral Society of forty voices, conducted by Mr. W. H. Stocks. A small orchestra supplied the accompaniments. Some unaccompanied part-songs and Grieg's 'At the cloister gate,' for ladies' voices, were also in the programme.

CAIRO.—At a concert given on December 19 at the Continental Hotel, Mr. B. Walton O'Donnell played his own 'Slumber song.'——On December 27, Mr. F. Kitchener and Mr. O'Donnell gave an organ and violoncello recital at St. Mary's Church. The programme included Karg-Elert's 'Harmonies du soir,' and Boëllmann's 'Variations symphoniques.'——On January 4, at a concert given at Shepherd's Hotel, Mr. Kitchener played Chopin's third Ballade and a Barcarolle of his own composition.

DOVER.—The Dover Choral Union recently gave a performance of German's 'Merrie England,' in the Town Hall, the soloists being Miss Beatrice Hughes-Pope, Miss Effie Martin, Mr. Joseph Boddy and Mr. Jackson-Potter. Mr. R. B. Freeman was the principal violinist, and Mr. Sydney R. Taylor presided at the organ. Mr. H. J. Taylor conducted.——On December 12, Spohr's 'Last Judgment' was sung in St. Mary's Parish Church, Dover, under the conductorship of Mr. H. J. Taylor. The choir was assisted by members of the Choral Union, and the band of strings, brass and drums consisted of contingents from the Amateur Orchestral Society and the R.A. band. The soloists were Miss Daisy Boyton, Mr. J. W. Yarrow, Mr. George de Orfe, and Mr. E. W. Barclay. Mr. Leonard S. Taylor presided at the organ.——'Christmas in the olden time,' although it has now been performed in Dover annually for the past eight or nine years, again attracted an audience which filled every part of the Town Hall on December 20. The work had been compiled and adapted by Mr. H. J. Taylor, and by its seasonableness, in particular, has become one of the features of Christmastide festivities.

EASTBOURNE.—Mr. B. Luard-Selby's clever cantata 'The Fakenham Ghost' certainly took the fancy of all who were present, as performers or listeners, at the annual concert of the Eastbourne College on December 18. The choir sang the cantata with appropriate spirit under the direction of Mr. F. Gillett, and also gave expressive interpretations of glees and madrigals. Solos and orchestral music completed the programme.

Hong-Kong.—Excellent work is being done here by Mr. Denman Fuller, who is organist at the cathedral (St. John's). On December 8 the Philharmonic Society gave an interesting choral and orchestral concert at St. George's Hall under Mr. Fuller's direction. Bishop's 'The chough and crow,' Betjemann's 'The song of the Western men,' Booth's madrigal 'To flowers,' Callcott's 'Love wakes and weeps,' a Gigue by German, and the Barcarolle from Offenbach's 'Tales of Hoffmann,' were in the programme. Choir and orchestra together numbered between sixty and seventy performers.

Huntingdon.—Dvorák's 'The spectre's bride' was performed in impressive and dramatic style by the Huntingdon and Godmanchester Choral Society at the Corn Exchange on December 13, under the able direction of Mr. Frank Clark. A highly-efficient orchestra gave brilliant effect to the score, and the solo work of Madame Anna Shergold and Mr. Hughes-Macklin was on a similar level.

Invercargill (N.Z.).—The Musical Union gave a concert on October 27 with a miscellaneous programme, in which male-voice part-songs and light orchestral selections provided the chief interest. Songs were given by Miss Rena Te Au and Mr. J. B. Struthers. The choir was that of the First Church, conducted by Mr. W. Quinn. Mr. Charles Grey conducted the orchestra.

Johannesburg.—On November 30 Mrs. Deane gave the first pianoforte recital by an English player in the Transvaal. The programme was long and comprehensive and was enthusiastically received.

Northampton.—A difficult programme, consisting of Dvorák's 'The spectre's bride' and Parry's 'Pied piper of Hamelin,' was chosen by the Musical Society for their concert on December 14, and under the inspiring guidance of Mr. C. J. King it was carried out to complete success. The exacting and widely different expressive demands made by the two works were met with admirable adaptability. An orchestra gave good support, and good solo work was done by Miss Gladys Moger, Mr. Henry Turnpenney and Mr. Herbert Hegner.

Perth.—The first oratorio performance in the fine City Hall, recently erected in Perth, took place on December 18 last, when the Musical Society gave 'Elijah' before a large and appreciative audience. With Miss Bessie Jones, Miss Phyllis Graves, Miss Myra Dixon, Mr. John Harrison, and Mr. Robert Radford as soloists, a large and experienced choir, and an adequate orchestra, the Society secured a memorable performance of the work. The occasion also marked the twenty-fifth year of Mr. Frank Graves's conductorship of the Society.

Ripon.—An excellent selection was made by the Ripon Choral Society for their most recent concert. Excerpts from Wagner's 'Die Meistersinger' made up the first part and Elgar's 'King Olaf' the second. Admirable work was done by the choir and the solo-singing, in the hands of Miss Nellie Judson, Mr. Samuel Mann and Mr. Frank Mullings, was efficient. Mr. C. H. Moody conducted.

Solihull.—Mendelssohn's 'Loreley' was given at the Public Hall on December 19 by the Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. S. Lindsay Kearne, who also appeared in the capacity of composer. His concert-overture, 'From Fairy-land,' proved highly popular. The soloists of the concert were Mrs. T. Cross (vocalist), Miss Phyllis Pegg (pianist), and Mrs. Horace Wilson (violinist). The programme also included part-songs, and German's 'Gipsy Suite' for orchestra.

Strathaven (Lanarkshire).—'The Laird of Heather Hall,' an opera written and composed by Dr. Robert Machardy, was performed here on December 19 and received with great enthusiasm by a large audience. Considerable use is made of national airs and instruments in the score.

Swansea.—The Church Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Sir A. C. Mackenzie's 'The Rose of Sharon' on January 18, under the direction of Mr. T. D. Jones. The picturesque melodious music, with its grateful work for the choir, earned the appreciation of all who were present, and the choral singing was on a high level. Solo parts were taken by Miss Emily Breare, Miss Violet Elliott, Mr. John Bardsley and Mr. Robert Burnett. Mr. Louis Torr was the organist. An orchestra of forty was led by Mr. Walter Whitaker.

Tientsin.—'The Messiah' was performed here for the first time on December 22, by the combined choirs of two churches, under the direction of Mr. A. M. Cockell. The choral singing was of good quality, and every circumstance reflected credit upon the conductor and his fellow-organizers of the event. Solo parts were taken by Mrs. von Hanneken, Mrs. Rees, Mrs. Tolliday, Mrs. Pegge, Mr. E. L. Cockell and Mr. H. E. Muriel. The organist was Mr. H. G. Riches.

Troon (N.B.).—A successful performance of Bridge's 'The Flag of England' was given by the Troon Choral Union on December 15, under the conductorship of Mr. A. Dinsdale. The soprano solos were sung by Miss Jenny Young. Mr. Richard Daeblitz, of the Scottish Orchestra, was solo violinist and also acted as leader of the local orchestra. The programme included Dr. Arthur Somervell's 'Charge of the Light Brigade,' and Eaton Faning's part-song 'Daybreak.'——On December 28, after conducting a successful performance of 'The Messiah,' Mr. A. Dinsdale was presented with a handsome solid mahogany writing bureau by 'members of Troon Parish Church Choir and Choral Society and friends, on his leaving Troon for Barony Parish Church, Glasgow.' Mrs. Dinsdale was also the recipient of a gold brooch.

Woking.—An exceptionally interesting concert was given by the Musical Society on December 19. The overture to Dr. Ethel Smyth's opera 'The Wreckers' was performed under the composer's own direction, and the remaining orchestral items included a scena entitled 'Fairies,' written by Mr. Alfred Wright. The chief choral number was 'The death of Minnehaha,' which was sung to good effect by the choir of sixty voices under the direction of Mr. Patrick White. Part-songs were also in the programme. The soloists were Miss Ada Forrest, Mr. R. E. Miles (vocalists), and Miss G. Mason (harpist).

Foreign Notes.

ALTONA.

Kgl. Musikdirektor Robert Bignell has formed an amateur orchestra of unusual size and excellence. The numbers of the strings are 24 firsts, 22 seconds, 12 violas, 10 cellos, and 8 double basses. Among the strings are about twenty ladies, chosen from the conductor's pupils. The wind and percussion players are professional, from the Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra.

BERLIN.

On January 5, M. Ysaye played Elgar's Violin concerto, with the Philharmonic Orchestra under Nikisch. The work had an enormous popular success, but some of the Berlin critics seem anxious to attribute it solely to the performer.—Robert Reitz offered an unusual programme at his violin recital. He played Bach's six Sonatas, and accomplished this enormous task with entire success. A writer in the Allgemeine Musik Zeitung considers him undoubtedly the finest Bach player of the younger generation.——Felix Draeseke's 'Christus-Mysterium,' a trilogy of oratorios filling three evenings, will be produced in February by the Kittel Choir and the Blüthner Orchestra.——The visit of the Sängervereinigung der Prager Lehrer was an unqualified success. The Society consists of fifty teachers (male) from Prague, under the conductorship of Prof. Franz Spilka. Every member sings everything by heart, and the conductor can consequently communicate his smallest intention with the greatest ease.——A mandoline recital has been given by Ernesto Rocco in the Bechsteinsaal, the programme including Paganini's Violin concerto in D, and works by Bach and Mozart (unaccompanied).——Eddy Brown continues to strengthen the good reputation he has made for himself.——Wolf-Ferrari's new three-act opera 'Der Schmuck der Madonna,' was produced at the Kurfürstenoper on December 23. Opinions of Berlin critics are divided, but they seem strongly influenced by an inborn dislike for the Italian dramatic style. The expression 'modernised Meyerbeer' is applied to the work by a writer in a leading musical journal.——A 'Wunderkind' of unusually mature gifts, the eleven-year-old violinist Lazslo Ipolyi, has appeared at the Beethovensaal. He is said to look exactly like a 'pocket edition of Ysaye, and to play like a little man.'——Richard Strauss's new opera, taken from a comedy by Molière, is not to be produced in an opera house, but in Reinhardt's Deutsches Theater in Berlin. The first performance is to take place next November, and there will be other performances during the season.——Eugen d'Albert will make his re-appearance as pianist on February 8 with the Philharmonic Orchestra, at a concert in aid of the Orchestra's widows and orphans' fund. He will play Concertos by Beethoven and Liszt. ——After being associated with Berlin opera for nearly twenty years, Dr. Karl Muck is to leave at the beginning of next season for Boston, where he will conduct the Symphony Orchestra for a period of five years.——It is possible that 'The Miracle,' now being performed at Olympia, London, will be produced in Berlin at Easter.——The young violoncellist, Hans Bottermund, has given a very successful recital in the Klindworth-Scharwenka Saal. His programme included Bach's Suite in C major for violoncello alone.—Madame Gemma Bellincioni has settled in Berlin, and has opened a school for singing.——An extraordinary concert took place at the house of Herr Karl Flesch last month. Ysaye, Kreisler, Mischa Elman, and Karl Flesch all played, Kreisler and Elman playing the Bach double Concerto.

BRUSSELS.

Two festival performances of 'Tristan' and one of 'The Ring' will be given this season at the Théâtre de la Monnaie under Otto Lohse's direction.

BUDA-PESTH.

Festival performances of all Wagner's operas, with the exception of 'Parsifal,' are to be given at the new Volksoper in May. Generalmusikdirektors Schuch and Mikorey will conduct.

CASSEL.

Siegfried Wagner's opera 'Der Kobold' will be performed this season at the Hoftheater.

DESSAU.

The first performance in Germany of Saint-Saëns's new opera 'Déjanire' was given here on January 1, under Mikorey's direction.

DRESDEN.

The 'Rosenkavalier' reached its fiftieth performance with the close of 1911. 'House full' has been the rule. Charpentier's 'Louise' and Humperdinck's 'Königskinder' are two other novelties this season. It is intended to give a Richard Strauss week later.

FRANKFORT-ON-MAIN.

The first German performance of Paul Dukas's 'Ariane et Barbe-Bleue' was given here on December 26.——The first performance of the three-act music-drama 'Oberst Chabert,' by Hermann W. von Waltershausen, took place on January 16. ——A great festival of sacred music will be held on April 3, 4, 5, at the Frankforter Festhalle, under the direction of Herr Mengelberg. Choirs from Amsterdam will take part with those of Frankfort, and three large orchestras will bring the total number of participants up to 2,000.

JENA.

At the fourth Academy concert, a Symphony in B flat major by Johann Christian Bach, edited from orchestral parts in the British Museum by Professor Stein, was performed. The programme also included the recently discovered Beethoven Symphony. The concert was conducted by Professor Stein.

LEIPSIC.

At the ninth Gewandhaus concert, Erich Korngold's 'Overture to a play' (performed for the first time) had a sensational success. This is the first work which Korngold (now fourteen years old) has scored entirely by himself.—— Mahler's eighth Symphony will be performed under Dr. Georg Göhler's direction in the Alberthalle on March 1 and 2. The choir of the Riedel-Verein will be strengthened by members of other Leipsic choirs, and there will be a large choir of children. The orchestra will number about a hundred and fifty.——A very successful performance of Karl Bleyle's secular cantata (in four movements), entitled 'Lernt lachen,' was given at the fourth Philharmonic concert, under the direction of Hofkapellmeister Richard Hagel.——Richard Strauss's opera 'Feuersnot' has been performed here for the first time.——The performance of Elgar's Violin concerto by Concertmeister Wollgandt, at the Gewandhaus on January 18, was an extraordinary success. We quote the following from a letter from Professor Gustav Schreck, Cantor of the Thomas Church in Leipsic: 'I have just spent a happy hour in the Gewandhaus, where Herr Concertmeister Wollgandt, Nikisch's son-in-law, played Elgar's Violin concerto. In a word, the success of composer and performer was enormous ; I have seldom heard applause so lasting and sincere as to-day in the Gewandhaus. The glorious work was played exquisitely (hinreissend schön) by Wollgandt and the orchestra ; every note from beginning to end was poured out like molten metal. I consider the work especially great, because the last movement shows the deepest inspiration. Sir Edward Elgar would have been happy had he been in Leipsic. Wollgandt proved himself to-day an artist of the first rank. Truly, it is not our business to congratulate sincerely composer, violinist, and publisher, but rather to thank them all heartily. It was a great artistic enjoyment.' At the moment of going to press we have seen a paragraph from the Leipziger Volkszeitung, very similarly worded to the letter quoted above.

MANNHEIM.

The Mahler Festival, already announced, is to take place on May 10 and 11. The eighth Symphony and the 'Lied von der Erde' are the chief works in the programmes. About a thousand performers will take part.

MOSCOW.

The Liszt Festival, recently given here, was under the direction of Kapellmeister Ernst Wendel, of Bremen. The programme included the 'Faust' Symphony, and the E flat Pianoforte concerto (played by Emil Sauer).

MUNICH.

The Mozart and Wagner Festival performances will take place this year during the month of August.——The pianist, Cella della Vrancea, made an excellent impression at her recital.——The Felix Mottl memorial concert took place on January 22, at the Odeon.

NEW YORK.

Elgar's second Symphony was played here for the first time on December 10 by the New York Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch, at the Century Theatre. The performance was preceded by an explanatory lecture delivered by Mr. Damrosch. On December 13 the Violin concerto was played, with Mr. Albert Spalding as soloist.——Mr. Pulitzer has bequeathed 500,000 dollars to the New York Philharmonic Society.

PARIS.

A new work by Gabriel Pierné, an oratorio entitled 'St. Francis of Assisi,' will be produced here in March under the conductorship of the composer.——Albéric Magnard's new opera, 'Berenice,' recently produced at the Opéra-Comique, was only a doubtful success.——A similar judgment has been passed on Lucien Lambert's ballet, 'La Roussalka,' produced at the Grand Opéra.——The Wagner Festival in May will include two performances of 'Tristan,' conducted by Nikisch, two of the 'Meistersinger,' conducted by Richter, and one performance of the 'Ring,' conducted by Weingartner.——A ladies' orchestra has been organized, and in the first of four concerts a high standard of excellence was reached. Rhené-Baton is the conductor.——Gounod's 'Faust' was recently performed for the fifteen-hundredth time at the Grand Opera.——A successful first performance in Paris of 'Les Girondins,' an opera by Fernand le Borne (originally produced in Lyons in 1905), has been given at the Gaité Lyrique.——Two operas by André Messager, 'Beatrice' and 'Dagobert,' are to be performed for the first time during this year.——At an organ recital given recently by Mr. Archibald Sessions, Mr. Reginald Steggall's 'Konzertstück' was heard in Paris for the first time.

ROME.

Humperdinck's 'Königskinder' is to be performed at the Constanzi Theatre in February.

SANGERHAUSEN.

Four hitherto unknown letters of J. S. Bach belonging to the municipality of Sangerhausen are to be exhibited in the Bach Museum in Eisenach.

WIESBADEN.

The 'Rosenkavalier' was performed here for the first time on December 26. The most important event of the concert season so far has been the performance of Max Reger's 100th Psalm by the Cäcilienverein, conducted by Herr G. Kogel.

Miscellaneous.

The Naval and Military Musical Union, an organization founded owing to the energies of the late John Farmer, recently offered a challenge cup for part-singing and unison-singing. This was won by the 31st Brigade R.F.A., who thus became 'entitled to sing at the larger festival which will be held next Spring, against representatives of Portsmouth, Chatham, Tidworth and other stations, for the Royal Navy and Army Challenge Shield.' The prominence that has been earned by the activities of the Union gave rise to an article appearing in a recent issue of The Times, from which we quote the following: 'For many years it has been a constant source of reproach and unfavourable comparison with Continental armies that the British soldier appeared to be acquainted only with the latest banalities of the music-hall. Such were the songs which were always brought forward at his sing-songs. But perhaps of more importance still was the fact that there was practically no use made of good rhythmical songs upon the line of march. . . . The Union has for its primary object "the encouragement of vocal music and the singing of the fine old land and sea songs in the Services." Every port, fleet, and garrison is invited to organize a branch, with singing clubs within its borders, affiliated one with another. At the close of the concert season competitions are suggested between the various clubs in each branch, and final competitions would be held in London or some other convenient centre. . . . The singing of choruses and four-part songs is particularly encouraged, and a special song-book has been issued by the Union. This contains about 100 of the finest specimens of such sailor and soldier songs as it has been possible to collect, and it will in course of time be enlarged to include similar songs from other collections, and especially some of the best specimens of British folk-music.

The annual Spring Festival of the London Sunday School Choir will be held on February 10 at the Royal Albert Hall, South Kensington. The choir and orchestra will consist of 1,200 adult performers, and Madame Ada Crossley and Mr. Charles Saunders have been engaged as soloists. The programme includes Handel's 'The King shall rejoice,' Mendelssohn's 'Come, let us sing,' Sullivan's 'Homeland,' Barnby's 'King all glorious,' anthems, choruses, and part-songs. Mr. William Whiteman will conduct the choral, and Mr. Wesley Hammet the orchestral numbers. The next great Crystal Palace Festival will be held on Wednesday, June 12.

Mr. T. H. Warner was recently the recipient of a purse of money and a signed address from his fellow officers of the Tonic Sol-fa Association. The address referred to his assiduous work as treasurer for fifteen years and secretary for thirteen years, and the personal esteem in which he was held. It was signed by Mr. J. Spencer Curwen (president), Mr. H. Coward (vice-president), Mr. John Graham (chairman), and Mr. G. H. Powell (treasurer).

Miss Grace Agnes Onions, a blind pianist of seventeen, who has been trained by Mr. Lloyd Edwards, has passed with honours three successive examinations at Trinity College of Music. The Maybrick Prize for Ballad singing offered by this institution has been won by Miss Florence C. Mills.

Mr. A. Foxton Ferguson, the bass of the Folk-Song Quartet, leaves England at the beginning of February for a two-months' tour in America, where he will give recitals and song-lectures upon Folk-music and Folk-lore.

Dr. Ernest Slater, organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, Calcutta, was personally complimented by the Queen-Empress upon the excellence of the service music provided on December 31.

There is an important article by Dr. W. H. Hadow in the January Quarterly Review on 'Music and the Drama.' It is written round a review of 'My Life' (Wagner) and some other books.

Dr. Caradog Roberts (Oxon.), organist of Bethlehem Congregational Church, Rhosllanerchrugog, was presented by his townspeople with his Doctor's robes on January 8.

Miss Maud MacCarthy (Mrs. William Mann) read a paper on 'Some Indian conceptions of music' at a meeting of the Musical Association on January 16.

A lead tablet was affixed on January 16 to 12, Seymour Street, Portman Square, to commemorate the residence of M. W. Balfe, who lived there from 1861 until 1864.

Mr. J. Matthews, organist of St. Stephen's Church, Guernsey, has been awarded the first prize in a competition for a song relating to Guernsey.

Mr. Sterling Mackinlay (32, Baker Street) is forming a small ladies' choir, for which amateurs and professionals are eligible.

Madame Marie Wieck, Hofpianist and Kammervirtuoso, sister of Clara Schumann, has reached her eightieth year.

Answers to Correspondents.

Ignoramus.—Failing Dr. Iliffe's book, we would ourselves like to know where an analysis of Bach's Fantasia and Fugue in A minor can be obtained. Elementary choral training is dealt with in Dr. McNaught's 'Hints on choir-training' (Novello, 2*d*.).

J. H.—We can give you no information concerning Lord Crofton, composer of the hymn tune 'Crofton's,' or A. Freeman, composer of the tune 'St. Martha's-on-the-Hill.' Perhaps some of our readers can oblige.

Enquirer.—Your description of your violin is insufficient as an indication of its value. You should show it to a well-known maker, such as Messrs. W. E. Hill, of Bond Street.

A. C.—We cannot recall a London performance of Rachmaninoff's 'Trio élégiaque,' Op. 9.

Remarkable Work

ON

MUSIC EDUCATION.

Written by Famous Experts.

THAT Wonderful Book, the MUSICAL EDUCATOR, seems this season to be entering upon a new lease of life. As our readers know, its aim is to supply in interesting form a complete and systematic musical education.

We would especially draw attention to the following names of Leaders in the Musical World, and of the subjects for which they are responsible. The practical value of these sections will be apparent to all students and professors of music and singing.

MARK HAMBOURG,
"The Piano and how to Play it."

EDWIN H. LEMARE,
"The Art of Organ Playing."

MADAME MARCHESI,
"The Teaching of Singing."

JOHN DUNN,
"On Playing the Violin."

SIR F. H. COWEN,
"The Art of Conducting."

Course of Voice Training, Singing, and Solfeggio. Course on the Pianoforte. Course on the Violin. Positions illustrated by Diagrams and Photographs. Course on Harmonium, American Organ, and on the Organ. Lessons on Scientific Basis of Music. Lessons on Rudiments of Music. Course on Harmony and Counterpoint. Lessons in Canon and Fugue. Lessons in Musical Forms, Musical Analysis and Composition. Dictionary of Musical Terms. Articles on the Instruments used in the Orchestras and in Military Bands. History of Music. Biographical Dictionary of Musicians. Articles on Children's Music and Musical Drill. Articles on Choir Training and Conducting. Article on Congregational Music. Article on Musical Degrees and Education. Article on Nationality in Music.

Its Value to the Teacher.

In "The Musical Educator" every section is dealt with by an expert. Its value to the teacher of music is obvious, because it shows the way—at once simple and lucid—in which some of the greatest of musical professors would set about the instruction of a pupil anxious to perfect himself in his particular department, whether it be that of the piano, the violin, the harp, or any other instrument, or of any department of singing.

Add to this its all-round value as a standard work of reference on every point concerning the wide domain of music and musicians, and it will be granted that "The Musical Educator" is unique as well as complete.

TWO OPINIONS.

Sir J. FREDERICK BRIDGE.
"'The Musical Educator' is full of useful information plainly set forth. The musical illustrations are excellent."

Dr. CRESER, Mus.D. Oxon, F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L.
(Examiner in Music at Trinity College), writes:—
"We have here an illuminative work of great value, not only to the student, but also to the general reader. . . . It contains excellent instructions."

FREE INQUIRY.

"Gounod's 'Redemption' appeals to the public largely on account of the words with which the music is associated, and the same can certainly be said of 'The Messiah.' In each case the music, however, is undoubtedly a powerful factor, and the words being not only impressive, but also familiar, the listener is doubly affected. . . . Then, to speak only of Gounod's work, it is strong because it is sincere. A gifted composer, by thoughtful and deep study of the sacred story, can illustrate it in tones effectively, but more convincingly if in true sympathy with the subject—in other words, if he be religious, using that term in its widest sense. And Gounod, like Bach, and in modern times Liszt, was of a serious cast of mind, and possessor, moreover, of a strongly emotional nature."—Daily Telegraph, March 1, 1909.

"If allowances are made for the state of popular musical thought in his day, and for the undoubted sincerity with which Gounod adopted a style that suited his nature, it is possible to consider his 'Redemption' in many respects a work of high art. Melody in itself, if dissociated from unsuitable surroundings, will never fail to appeal, and broad choral effect, when secured by skilful methods, will always give pleasure. The audience that gathered on Saturday evening to hear the 'Redemption' performed by the Alexandra Palace Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill, showed by their number and their interested attention that the work still retains its hold."—Morning Post, March 1, 1909.

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' Mr. Gaul's work will undoubtedly greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed. The work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul has to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

Arranged for a limited Orchestra—namely, Strings, 2 Flutes, 2 Clarinets, 2 Cornets, Bass Trombone or Euphonium, and Kettledrums.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s. Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100.

VOCAL SCORE, STAFF NOTATION, FOURTH THOUSAND.

TENTH EDITION.

THE SHIPWRECK*

(DESCRIPTIVE CHORAL SONG).

MORNING.

'Tis morn, and the gallant bark bounds free
In the joyous gale o'er a sunlit sea;
And the waves, as they merrily waft her along,
Welcome her onward with dance and song.

But a black cloud looms from the western sky,
And tells as it scuds of a tempest nigh,
And the sea-eagle screams as he flaps in the shrouds,
Like a warning voice from the bursting clouds.

THE STORM.

It comes! it comes! the storm!
The shrieking, shattering storm!
With the thunder's crash, and the lightning's flash,
'Mid the yawning skies and the wild waves' dash!
See yonder, that form—'tis the fiend of the storm!
How he whirls the good ship in the might of his wrath,
To the gulf where the foam surges white on his path!
And a wild cry rings thro' the tempest shrill,
As she sinks in the billows, and all is still.

EVENING.

'Tis eve on the waters; an ocean of light
Bares its breast to the moon, rising gentle and bright;
And the stars, as they beam on the silv'ry main,
On the calm of its depths are all mirror'd again.

Ah, list! o'er the deep doth a melody sweep,
Now the storm-fiend hath flown and the waves are asleep!
Ah, list! o'er the grave of the true and the brave!
'Tis the mermaiden sighing her dirge on the wave!

NEW LENT CANTATA

GETHSEMANE TO GOLGOTHA.

The Libretto by YORKE CHESTER

is divided into Three Parts—

1. IN THE GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE. 2. BEFORE PILATE'S HOUSE.
3. AT THE FOOT OF THE CROSS.

These scenes being suggested by Montgomery's Hymn, the three verses of which, commencing "Go to dark Gethsemane," "Follow to the Judgment-Hall," and "Calvary's Mournful Mountain Climb"—sung as a chorale by the choir—respectively commence the three parts of the Cantata, which will be found to be so pictorially and dramatically constructed as to enlist the attention and sympathies of both Choir and Congregation. Each part concludes with a short selection from the Litany to be said by the Officiating Minister and the Congregation, together with a Hymn.

The Music by EDMUND TURNER

Is one of the best examples of this composer's work, combining extreme effectiveness with a comparative absence of difficulties, so that time spent at rehearsals is always profitably employed and not wasted in overcoming tasks which are of no effect even when conquered.

PRICE, 1S. 6D. TONIC SOL-FA, 1S. WORDS ONLY, 3S. PER 100.

A Specimen Copy of the above will be sent to any Clergyman, Choirmaster, Organist, or Conductor (please mention church or appointment) for six stamps.

IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING
BY
FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

A HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC
CONTAINING
600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS
BY
ERNEST A. DICKS,

Fellow of the Royal College of Organists.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, London, Dublin, Durham, and Edinburgh, and the Victoria University; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, and The Royal College of Organists. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

Through the kindness of Dr. E. H. Turpin the seventh edition of the Handbook of Examinations in Music includes the latest type of Papers set by Trinity College of Music, London, in their scheme of Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge.

The work will also be found to have been considerably enlarged by the addition of fifty specimen questions, with answers. They have been designed for the most part after the manner of those set in the Theory Paper for the L.R.A.M. Diploma, and also that required by candidates for the Higher Practical Examinations held by Trinity College of Music, London. The author earnestly hopes that these additions will considerably enhance the value of the Handbook, and render it increasingly helpful to students.

Beg to announce that they have arranged with MACMILLAN & CO. for the joint production of a series of UP-TO-DATE Music Primers under the title of

"MUSICAL COMPOSITION."

A Short Treatise for Students.

By C. V. STANFORD.

Extra Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net. Post-free, 3s. 10d.

LONDON:

MACMILLAN & Co. (Ltd.) and STAINER & BELL (Ltd.)

This work forms Volume I. of "The Musician's Library."

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

THE TIMES.—"The appearance of Sir Charles Villiers Stanford's little treatise on 'Musical Composition' means far more than the inauguration of 'The Musician's Library,' excellent as that series offers to be. It is the first treatise, for three centuries, in which composition has been treated by a composer whose own works have claims to live."

THE SPECTATOR.—"The new 'Musician's Library' makes an excellent start with Sir Charles Stanford's volume on 'Musical Composition.' A masterpiece of compression, and has the two-fold virtue of appealing alike to experts and laymen."

THE REFEREE.—"I warmly recommend the book not only to students but to earnest music lovers, who will find their enjoyment of music greatly increased thereby."

MUSICAL HERALD.—"We cannot pay the writer a greater or more genuine compliment than to say that reading the book has been a real pleasure, that we have stored many hints of the greatest value for future use, and that we have already begun to read it for the third time."

MUSICAL NEWS.—"The book is throughout written in a forceful and often epigrammatic style, and will be read with pleasure and advantage not only by students but by many who have passed that stage. Teachers in particular will be interested in it."

Send for Prospectus of above and other volumes in course of preparation.

Dr. McNaught and Mr. Henry J. Iles have also been appointed on the Jury.

The competitions are for choirs and bands only. In these announcements only the particulars and conditions relating to choirs are dealt with.

COMPETITIVE AND NON-COMPETITIVE ENTRIES.

It is very important for British choirs to know that the gathering appeals not only to choirs that desire to compete, but to other choirs that will attend simply to take part in a great choral exhibition. The choral competitions will be held on Whit-Monday, and the winning choirs, and all other choirs that come NOT FOR COMPETITION, will be heard on Tuesday, May 28. We give below the conditions of entry as regards these two chief divisions of the gathering.

In order to arrive at a clear understanding of the numerous points involved, Dr. McNaught and Mr. Bonnaire (the English representative) recently spent some days in Paris for the purpose of discussing details with M. Déville, M. Chavanon, M. de Rillé, and other members of the Paris committee. Some of the chief results of these conversations were:

(a) The alteration of the date of entry for competing choirs to February 10.

(b) The expansion of the idea of including non-competitive choral singing on Tuesday, May 28. Entries not required before early in May.

(c) The proposal (initiated by M. Deville) to invite a thousand British school children to come and sing on the Tuesday, and to be the guests of the children of Paris. That is, the thousand children will be fed and housed, but their travelling expenses will have to be defrayed on this side. Very considerable reductions of fares are being offered by railway companies both here and in France. Entries not required until April 1.

(d) The ensuring that as far as is considered necessary the imposed tests for choirs shall be provided by the various publishers with English words, and in the tonic sol-fa as well as the staff notation. All the Parisian publishers concerned were interviewed as to this, and arrangements were made that the copies of the music shall be issued by February 26. Before that date the pieces cannot be seen or even named.

GENERAL TIME-TABLE.

Sunday, May 26.—Opening of the competitions. Chiefly foreign bands and choirs.

Monday, May 27.—British and other choirs in the chief sections.

Tuesday, May 28.—Concerts and performances by the winning choirs and the non-competitive choirs. Also the competition of children from Paris schools and from British schools.

We now give details regarding the three main divisions of the festival.

I.—THE CHORAL COMPETITIONS.

CLASSIFICATION OF SECTIONS.

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

In five divisions (nine sections).

Division of excellence	One section.
,, superior	,, ,,
1st division	1st ,, / 2nd ,,
*2nd ,, ...	1st ,, / 2nd ,,
*3rd ,, ...	1st ,, / 2nd ,, / 3rd ,,

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

(Without accompaniment.)

Division of excellence	One section.
,, superior	,, ,,
1st division	,, ,,

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (S.A.T.B).

(With accompaniment).

Division of excellence	One section.
,, superior	,, ,,

(Without accompaniment.)

Division of excellence	,, ,,
,, superior	,, ,,

The divisions and sections of the male-voice class are necessary, because of the French system of classification of choirs at the numerous competitions held all over the country. A French choir must climb its way up the ladder one rung at a time, and can only enter for the section next above that in which it last won a prize. Hence it follows that the upper classes, more especially those for 'Excellence' and 'Superior,' represent the survival of the fittest. For what section should this or that British choir enter will be a frequent question. The following are points to note and consider:

NEW SOCIETIES BARRED.

(1.) No entry from a Society formed for the purpose of competing at this contest will be received. Entries will only be accepted from Societies founded before January, 1911 (not 1912). [N.B.—This does not apply to choirs entering for the Division of Honour (that is, not for competition).]

DATES OF ENTRY ALTERED.

(2.) All entries must be accompanied by the entrance fee and be received by February 10 (not February 1 as previously announced). The Agent-General for Great Britain is Mr. H. Bonnaire, 20, High Holborn, London, W.C.

MISCELLANEOUS.

(3.) No one choir can enter for more than one section.

(4.) No conductor can conduct more than one choir in the same section.

(5.) British choirs can enter for ANY section subject to the above conditions.

* These sections are comparatively elementary, and hardly suited for British choirs.

(6.) No alteration of entry can be made after February 10.

(7.) No Paris Society may compete. The best societies will sing for honour on the non-competitive day.

(8.) It is a peculiarity of the arrangements that first and second prizes are repeated in the various sections, except in the case of the Grand Prix of 10,000 francs (£400). In the Excellence division first and second prizes will be awarded in every group of seven choirs, and in Superior and other divisions, in every group of not more than twelve choirs.

(9.) Although the Excellence division will appeal chiefly to the large Continental male-voice choirs, there is no obstacle to choirs of, say, 50 or so voices entering. Of course the chance of winning is greater in the Superior and lower classes, but the glory of winning in the Excellence will be much greater. If British choirs do not appear in the Excellence class, the choral reputation of the nation will suffer.

(10.) Most of the entries of Continental choirs will be in the male-voice classes. There are comparatively few female-voice or mixed-voice choirs, even in Paris.

(11.) Every choir will have to sing (a) a stipulated piece, (b) an own-choice piece, and (c) a sight-test (obligatory for French Societies in order to classify them for future competitions, but optional for British choirs).

(12.) None of the stipulated pieces are very long. The Excellence male-voice piece takes about six or seven minutes to perform (not twenty-five minutes, as previously stated). The own-choice piece must not exceed twenty-five minutes in performance, and it must not be one with which the choir has gained a first prize within three years of April, 1912.

(13.) The entrance fees are small. They range from £1 4*s*. to 8*s*., and the amounts will be returned to all who compete. Societies in the country who are doubtful whether circumstances will allow them to compete in May, are recommended to pay the entrance fee. It is not much to sacrifice, and it secures the right to compete.

(14.) Prizes.—Money prizes to the amount of £12,000 are offered. The amount may be increased to £20,000. The grand prize for male-voice choirs is £400. Other prizes are on the same liberal scale. The highest money-prizes for sight-singing are 800 francs (£32), which amount is offered to men's choirs, mixed choirs (accompanied section and unaccompanied section) and 600 francs (£24) to female-voice choirs; there are numerous smaller prizes in the lower divisions, and all through, in addition to the money-prizes, there are crowns, medals, &c. In the event of two Societies tieing for the first place, the first and second prizes are to be added and equally divided between the two Societies.

As already stated above, the prizes will be repeated in accordance with the number of competitors in all divisions (except in case of the Grand Prize).

(15.) The order in which choirs, &c., will compete will be decided by a ballot, which will take place at the Hôtel de Ville (the Paris Mansion House) on February 18.

(16.) Delegates will attend Societies in order to give them any assistance they may require. These delegates will be attached to the respective Societies during the whole time of their stay in Paris.

(17.) Substantial reductions of fares have already been agreed to by the railway companies, and the hotels are granting special low terms.

II.—Non-competitive Singing.

Tuesday, May 28.—This section is open to any choir which may be formed for the occasion. Each choir may choose its own programme, to last not more than thirty minutes. The pieces may be accompanied or not, but it will not be possible to arrange for orchestral accompaniment, if only because of the difficulty of adequate rehearsal. A good deal has been heard in Paris as to the capacity of many of the best British choirs. It is very much hoped that they will be well represented on this occasion. They are certain to receive a hearty reception. Entries need not be made before April 1.

III.—Children's Choirs.

It had already been arranged that the school choirs of Paris should compete with one another on the Tuesday, May 28. The idea of adding to this scheme by inviting 1,000 children to come from London and other British schools is a recent one. It was suggested by M. Deville, the president of the 'Concours,' who has always displayed the warmest friendship for the British nation. Mr. Bonnaire proposed that the invited children be considered the guests of the children of Paris during their stay in the city, and this proposal was heartily adopted. The visit will be a unique and long-remembered experience for all who are privileged to go.

The competitions in the schools sections are divided as follows:

(a) Boys; (b) Girls. No mixed-voice choirs. There will be two grades: Superior (the higher) and the First division. The stipulated piece to be in three parts, unaccompanied. The music of the imposed test will be supplied free. There will be a sight-test in unison for Division I., and in two parts for the Superior division. There are no entrance fees, and entries can be made early in May. Dr. McNaught has been asked to select the test-piece for the British choirs, and to provide the sight-test in both notations.

Further information as to this section of the scheme will be given later.

Roughly it is desired that twenty children's choirs of about fifty voices each should come from Great Britain.

MORRISTON, S. WALES.—December 25 and 26.

This is styled a 'semi-national' Eisteddfod, and is an annual event of considerable importance. On this occasion it was well patronised by both competitors and listeners. Dr. McNaught and Mr. Cecil Williams adjudicated, and made the following awards: male-voice choirs, Morriston Male-voice Party (Mr. Tom Morgan), mixed-voice choirs, Skewen United (Mr. Evan Morris), soprano (two classes), Miss May Harries and Madame Richards; contralto, Miss Esther Cooper; tenor, Mr. Richard Williams; baritone, Mr. Griffith J. Hill. Acton-song, Morriston (Miss Annie Watts).

An evening concert was held at which Smart's 'The bride of Dunkerron' and MacCunn's 'The wreck of the Hesperus,' were performed by the Tabernacle United Choir, under Mr. W. P. Rowlands. The soloists were Miss Edith Evans, Mr. Morgan Kingston and Mr. Thorpe Bates.

CHESTER.—December 26.

At this successful event five male-voice choirs sang Cyril Jenkins's 'Deep Jordan's banks,' the prize being won by Highfield, Runcorn. Stretford Glee and Madrigal were first in the mixed-voice competition. The solo prize-winners were Miss Bessie Tregonwy (soprano), Miss Lillian C. Smith (contralto), Mr. G. Hilditch (tenor), Mr. R. Isfryn Jones baritone). Mr. Harry Evans adjudicated.

WORKINGTON—January 1.

The number of entries in this event were sixty more than last year. Out of the twenty-nine classes in the syllabus, five were choral. The tests and results in these were as follows:

Church, Chapel or Mission Choirs.

Tests: 'Hymn to the Trinity' (Tchaikovsky).
'The three ravens' (Bantock).

3rd. Millom Wesleyan (Mr. B. Pill).
2nd. Workington P.M. (Mr. F. Dobie).
1st. Lamplugh Church (Mr. Hales).

Children's Choirs (age up to 16).

Tests: 'I've been roaming' (Bernard Johnson).
'Viking song' (Coleridge-Taylor).

2nd. Congregational Jr., Cleaton Moor.
1st. Parochial School, Lamplugh.

Male-Voice Choirs.

Tests: 'Loud sang the Spanish cavalier' (Coleridge-Taylor).
'The hunter, the rabbit, and the moon' (Feodor Berger).

1st. Whitehaven (Mr. A. Woolege).
2nd. Millom (Mr. Cooke).
Workington Wesleyan (Mr. J. Hanna).

Mixed-Voice Choirs.

Tests: 'Allen-a-Dale' (McEwen).
'A slumber song' (F. N. Lohr).

Haverigg Madrigal (Mr. H. G. Cooke).
2nd. Workington Madrigal (Mr. A. Wood).
1st. Millom Vocal Union (Mr. Rowland Johnson).
Seaton Choral Society (Mr. T. Dixon).

The chief solo prize-winners were Miss Mary Kendall (senior pianoforte), Miss Catherine Leadbitter (senior violin), Miss A. Young (soprano), Miss Frances Davidson (special soprano), Miss Lizzie Soutar (mezzo-soprano), Miss Ann Hayes (contralto), Mr. W. Barnes (tenor), Mr. J. T. Lacklinson (baritone), and Mr. F. E. Dobie (bass).

The adjudicators were Mr. C. H. Fogg and Mr. F. J. Livesey. Madame Sadler-Fogg took part in the two evening concerts.

MIDDLESBROUGH (Cleveland and Durham).
January 1, 2.

This annual Eisteddfod was again carried through to success, with an increase in the number of entries and an improvement in the standard of musical performance. Mr. Harry Evans adjudicated all the musical competitions. He awarded first-prizes to the following solo competitors: Miss Dorothy Copeland (pianoforte, under 12), Miss Kathleen Downes (pianoforte, 12-16), Miss Alice Hayes (violin, under 14), Miss Gertrude M. Brown (violin, 14-21), Miss Trotter (soprano), Miss Ruth Dawson (contralto), Mr. S. T Edwards (tenor), Mr. J. W. Knowlson (baritone), Mr. Len Hickson (bass), and Master J. T. Birkbeck (boys' singing). In the girls' vocal solo class, first-prizes were given to Miss Hilda Pugh, Miss Mary Hall, Miss Ivy Die, and Miss Lizzie Armstrong. Quartet-singing prizes were won by 'A, B, C, D,' Stockton (mixed) and Medley (male).

The children's competitions included one for action-songs, in which St. Philomena's, Middlesbrough (Miss Mabel Lockey), were successful. Crescent Road Junior Choir, Middlesbrough (Mr. Charles Mare), won the less advanced choral competition. In the higher class, the test was Walford Davies's 'The Lamb,' and the first-prize was won by Crescent Road Senior Choir (Mr. Mare).

In the class open to church choirs, Coundon Wesleyan (Mr. John Teesdale) were successful. The tests, entries and results in the chief competitions were as follows:

Mixed-Voice Choirs.

Tests: 'Lord, Thou alone art God' (Mendelssohn).
'Summer song' (Schumann).

1st. Middlesbrough Madrigal Society (Mr. A. Gordon Hood).
2nd. St. Thomas's Choir, Port Clarence (Rev. Robert Harris).

Male-Voice Choirs.

Tests: 'Ah, were I on yonder plain' (Mendelssohn).
'Pilgrim's song' (Cornelius).
Stockton Lyric (Mr. D. J. Jones).

2nd. Middlesbrough Apollo (Mr. T. Nicholas).
1st. Cleveland Harmonic (Mr. Gavin Kay).

ABERDEEN.—April 27.

Workers' Choirs.

This year's scheme is meeting with remarkable success. The ordinary choirs and choral Societies are being given a rest so far as competitions are concerned, and only factory, workshop, and club choirs are catered for. The idea has brought many new choirs into existence, and the interest taken is very great.

The following is a list of the choirs, with their conductors, which have already been formed and have commenced rehearsal with a view to competing at the Festival in April:

Berryden Mills (Female)—Rev. A. A. Foster.
C. Playfair and Company (Female)—Mr. W. T. Clemens.
Broadford Works (Mixed)—Miss Norris Adams.
Culter Paper Mills (Mixed)—Miss Norris Adams.
Aberdeen Combworks (Female)—Mr. J. Hutcheson.
Ogston and Tennant, Ltd. (Male)—Mr. J. S. B. Cheyne.
A. Pirie and Sons (Female)—Mr. James Hay.
Esslemont and Macintosh (Female)—Mr. James Murray.
Watt and Grant (Female)—Miss Watt.
Pratt and Keith (Female)—Mr. G. P. Adams.
George Falconer and Son (Female)—Mr. F. S. Esson.
R. K. Smith, Ltd. (Mixed)—Mr. James Ritchie.
Bleachfield Works (Female)—Miss Norris Adams.
Railway Joint Staff (Male)—Mr. G. Crookshanks.
Railway Staff, Inverurie (Male)—Mr. John Reid.

The following are choirs drawn from social institutions:

Holburn Girls' Club (Female)—Miss J. M. Wright.
Oldmachar Girls' Guild (Female)—Miss M. Skakle.
St. Andrew's Church Guild (Female)—Miss Norris Adams.
Buckie Temperance Choir (Mixed)—Mr. John Barritt.
Keith P.S.A. Choir (Mixed)—Mr. John Taylor.

Besides the choirs mentioned others may, of course, eventually be formed. Steps have been taken to form a choir in connection with Mugiemoss Paper Works, and a male-voice choir is also being formed from the Post Office staff in Aberdeen. In the latter case the material available has been found embarrassing in its extent, and the question of departmental choirs has been under consideration. The addition of the telephone staff, too, has paved the way for mixed choirs.

J. & P. SCHIEDMAYER PIANOS AT THE TURIN EXHIBITION, 1911.

Extract from a leading Continental paper:

"The most important Exhibition amongst German piano manufacturers is that of the world-renowned firm, J. & P. SCHIEDMAYER, OF STUTTGART. This firm has supplied 16 Imperial and Royal Courts, and is in possession of 54 medals and diplomas of honour and four Grands Prix at the International Exhibitions of Paris, 1900, St. Louis, 1904, Roubaix, 1911, and Turin, 1911, and has become as popular in Italy as in other countries. The Concert Room at Turin contains eleven instruments of magnificent construction. All the instruments are distinguished by a full and delightful tone."

Mr. SCHIEDMAYER, head of the firm of J. & P. Schiedmayer, has been officially appointed Judge at 13 Exhibitions (including Brussels, 1910), at all of which his pianos were, of course, "hors concours." This honour acknowledges him to be one of the greatest authorities on piano construction in the world.

The Trade and Profession are invited to call at Archibald Ramsden's, and test for themselves as to the magnificent tone quality and construction of these instruments.

Mus. Bac.s, L.R.A.M.s, A.R.C.M.s, F.R.C.O.s, testify in strong terms to the value of the Macdonald Smith System of Touch and Technique and use it with their pupils. Sir Frederick Bridge has made more than one public reference to it. It may therefore be adopted with every confidence. Mr. Macdonald Smith dictates each lesson personally, and no pupil is too backward or too advanced for one or other of his Three Courses. It is worth your while to find out what the System can do in your case, from "Light on Pianoforte Playing," which will be sent free on application.

NEW METHODS IN PIANOFORTE TUITION.

In all branches of Education methods of teaching have been revolutionized as the result of recent investigations and suggestions of psychologists and physiologists. As the result, it has been found possible to impart and acquire knowledge MORE EASILY, without the difficulty and drudgery of former methods.

One branch of Pianoforte tuition in particular, viz., Sight-Playing, admirably lends itself to development along new lines. The ability to play well at sight depends upon there being a direct connection between the eye and the hand, so that at the mere sight of the notes the correct keys are struck. Keyboard practice does little to establish that connection.

The principles upon which

is based are scientifically sound, and the System, by direct tuition, enables any pianist to play at sight all music technically possible to him.

About 15 minutes daily for three months is all the practice necessary, and a greater proficiency is obtained than by years of practising for many hours daily.

Booklet describing the methods employed post-free on application, L. M. Ehremayer, 27, Chancery Lane, W.C.

MARCH 1, 1912.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY OF LONDON.

This month the Philharmonic Society of London enters upon the hundredth year of its existence. It has a record of which the nation has just cause for pride. Our national appreciation of the best music is sometimes spoken of slightingly, but whatever may be the truth of this opinion we are entitled, in face of this record, to ask what orchestral Society in any city abroad can claim to have done more than the Philharmonic did during the first half of the 19th century in recognising and encouraging the most eminent composers of the period without regard to nationality? The pathetic association of the Philharmonic Society with the immortal Beethoven in the last years of his life would alone entitle it to fame. It is not a little significant that the great composer in his need appealed for assistance to far-off England. The roll-call of the distinguished composers who were directly connected with the Society's operations includes the names of Cherubini, Liszt, Weber, Mendelssohn, Spohr, Moscheles, Costa, Wagner, Gounod, Sterndale Bennett, and many other well-known foreign and English musicians.

Before the establishment of the Society, the taste for classical orchestral music had been gauged by the concerts given by the violinist Salomon, whose name has become perpetuated by its association with the twelve Symphonies composed by Haydn for his (Salomon's) concerts, the first of which was given in Hanover Square Rooms on March 11, 1791. Haydn had arrived in London on New Year's Day, bringing with him the first six of the Symphonies, all of which were performed during the composer's eighteen-months' sojourn in England. In 1794 Haydn again visited London, and brought with him the remaining six of the Symphonies, which also were duly performed by Salomon. In 1799 his concerts were discontinued owing to lack of financial support. This failure left London destitute so far as the provision of modern orchestral music was concerned. It is true that there were the Ancient Concerts (formally styled 'The Concerts of Antient Music,' and also known as 'The King's Concerts'), which had been established since 1776; but as one of the rules formulated by the self-denying promoters was that no music composed within the previous twenty years should be performed, the musical outlook was restricted at a period when the boundaries of the art were being greatly enlarged. It was doubtless owing to the recollection of the pleasure and profit derived from Salomon's concerts, and to the sense of what was being sacrificed, that in 1813 a number of eminent Metropolitan musicians and persons of social influence determined to establish a new and less conservative orchestral Society than that which managed the Ancient Concerts. The idea took shape at a meeting that was held on Sunday, January 24, 1813, at the instance of Messrs. J. B. Cramer, T. A. Corri, and W. Dance. The preliminary announcement was as follows:

> The want of encouragement which has for many years past been experienced by that species of music which called forth the efforts and displayed the genius of the greatest masters, and the almost utter neglect into which instrumental pieces in general have fallen, have long been sources of regret to the real amateur and to the well-educated professor; a regret which, though it has hitherto proved unavailing, has not extinguished the hope that persevering exertions may yet restore to the world those compositions which have excited so much delight, and rekindle in the public mind that taste for excellence in instrumental music which has so long remained in a latent state. In order to effect this desirable purpose, several members of the musical profession have associated themselves, under the title of The Philharmonic Society, the object of which is to promote the performance in the most perfect manner possible, of the best and most approved instrumental musick consisting of full pieces, concertantes for not less than three principal instruments, sestets, quintets, and trios; excluding concertos, solos, and duets; and requiring that vocal music, when introduced, shall have full orchestral accompaniments, and shall be subjected to the same restrictions.

It was resolved that the new Society should consist of thirty members and an unlimited number of Associates. Both categories paid an annual subscription of three guineas, and in addition four guineas for a seat at the eight concerts to be given during the season. A reduction was made for extra tickets for members' families and residents in their houses. Tickets were non-transferable. The following names (in addition to the three given above) of some of the original members have a familiar appearance to this day: Attwood, Berger, Bishop, Clementi, Horsley, Knyvett, Neate, Novello, Salomon, Shield, Smart and Viotti. The first concert of the Society was given on March 8, 1813, at the Argyll Rooms (then at the corner of Regent Street and Little Argyll Street). We give on the next page a facsimile as to size as well as to other details of the programme.

It is not known which Symphony of Beethoven was played on this occasion It must have been one of the first six, because the parts of the seventh were not published until 1816. In accordance with the preliminary announcement the programme included chamber music, there being at that time no other opportunity for subscribers to hear this class of composition.

For many years there was no conductor in the modern meaning of the word. One of the professional members 'presided' at the pianoforte, and, with the principal first violin, shared the responsibility of keeping the band together. Moreover, the directors did not regulate that the same two musicians should occupy these positions during a season. This unsatisfactory arrangement continued until 1820, when, as will be seen later, Spohr introduced the baton.

It is curious that in 1814 the programmes were stated to be in two 'acts,' not parts. This practice was maintained for thirty years; but in 1844, at the second concert of the season, the use of the word 'parts' was resumed. It may also be noted that the word 'programme' was not used by the Society at all until it appeared on the announcement of the concert given on July 17, 1868.

Reynell, Printer, 21, Piccadilly, London.

In 1815 Cherubini, whose reputation was then very high, came to England, and at the third concert of the season, given on March 13, he conducted—that is, he presided at the pianoforte during—a performance of his overture 'Anacreon' and he accepted a commission to compose for the Society a new Symphony, an Overture and a vocal piece, for which he was to receive £200. It was in this year that the Society agreed to pay Beethoven 75 guineas for three of his manuscript overtures, two of which were 'The Ruins of Athens' and 'King Stephen.' The acknowledgment of the composer was as follows:

Vienna, Feb. 5, 1816.

Mr. Neate has taken of me, in July, 1815, three Overtures for the Philharmonic Society of London, and has paid me for them the sum of seventy-five guineas, for which sum I engage not to have these said Overtures printed elsewhere, either in parts or score, always reserving for myself the right to have the said works performed wherever I please, and to publish them in pianoforte arrangement so soon as Mr. Neate shall write me word that they have been performed in London. Besides which, Mr. Neate assures me that he obligingly takes upon himself, after the lapse of one or two years, to obtain the consent of the Society to my publishing these three Overtures in parts as well as in score, their consent to that effect being indispensable. Thus I respectfully salute the Philharmonic Society.

Ludwig van Beethoven.

In 1817 the Society offered Beethoven 300 guineas to come to London and superintend the production of two symphonies to be composed by him for the Society. In answer Beethoven asked for 400 guineas, of which 150 guineas was to be paid in advance. In the end the scheme was abandoned. The programme of the second concert of the year 1820, given on March 20, for the first time uses the term 'conductor' instead of 'at the pianoforte.' This was evidently a case of intelligent anticipation, for at the next concert the real revolution took place.

THE CONDUCTOR'S BATON.

The programme for the concert given on April 10, 1820, announced that the leader would be Mr. Spohr and the 'conductor' Mr. Attwood. One of the items was 'a new Sinfonia (MS.) (never performed)' by the distinguished violinist. At the rehearsal the arrangements were changed, and for the first time the baton was used. The incident is naïvely described by Spohr in his autobiography. He says:

Meanwhile my turn had come to direct one of the Philharmonic Concerts, and I had created no less sensation than with my solo play. It was at that time still the custom there that when symphonies and overtures were performed the pianist had the score before him, not exactly to conduct from it, but only to read after and to play in with the orchestra at pleasure, which, when it was heard, had a very bad effect. The real conductor was the first violin, who gave the tempi, and now and then, when the orchestra began to falter, gave the beat with the bow of his violin. So numerous an orchestra, standing so far apart from each other as that of the Philharmonic, could not possibly go exactly together, and in spite of the excellence of the individual members, the ensemble was much worse than we are accustomed to in Germany. I had therefore resolved when my turn came to direct, to make an attempt to remedy this defective system. Fortunately, at the morning rehearsal on the day when I was to conduct the concert, Mr. Ries took the place at the piano, and he readily assented to give up the score to me and to remain wholly excluded from all participation in the performance. I then took my stand with the score at a separate music desk in front of the orchestra, drew my directing baton from my coat pocket, and gave the signal to begin. Quite alarmed at such a novel procedure, some of the directors would have protested against it; but when I besought them to grant me at least one trial they became pacified. The symphonies and overtures that were to be rehearsed were well known to me, and in Germany I had already directed at their performance. I therefore could not only give the tempi in a very decisive manner, but indicated also to the wind instruments and horns all their entries, which ensured to them a confidence such as hitherto they had not known there. I also took the liberty, when the execution did not satisfy me, to stop, and in a very polite but earnest manner to remark upon the style of execution, which remarks Mr. Ries at my request interpreted to the orchestra. Incited thereby to more than usual attention, and conducted with certainty by the visible manner of giving the time, they played with a spirit and a correctness such as till then they had never been heard to play with. Surprised and inspired by this result, the orchestra, immediately after the first part of the symphony, expressed aloud its collective assent to the new mode of conducting, and thereby overruled all further opposition on the part of the directors. In the vocal pieces also, the conducting of which I assumed at the request of Mr. Ries, particularly in the recitative, the leading with the baton, after I had explained the meaning of my movements, was completely successful, and the singers repeatedly expressed to me their satisfaction for the precision with which the orchestra now followed them.

The result in the evening was still more brilliant than I could have hoped for. It is true the audience were at first startled by the novelty and were seen whispering together; but when the music began, and the orchestra executed the well-known symphony with unusual power and precision, the general approbation was shown immediately on the conclusion of the first part by a long-sustained clapping of hands. The triumph of the baton as a time-giver was decisive, and no one was seen any more seated at the piano during the performance of symphonies and overtures.

Hogarth's History of the Philharmonic Society down to 1862 states that in 1825 'the overture to "Euryanthe" was performed, this being the first time of any of Weber's compositions being heard at these concerts.' But the printed programme for the concert given on February 23, 1824, announces the overture to 'Der Freischütz.' Weber himself came to London in 1826, and conducted the concert given on April 3, this being his first public appearance in this country. A brilliant assembly received him with great enthusiasm. The untimely death of the composer on June 5, at the residence of Sir George Smart, caused much grief. At the concert given on June 12, Handel's 'Dead march in Saul' was played 'as a tribute to Departed Genius.'

In 1822 the directors had offered £50 to Beethoven for a manuscript Symphony. It was to be delivered during the month of March, and the composer was to be at liberty to dispose of the work eighteen months after the receipt of the manuscript by the Society. The money was paid to Beethoven, but the music was for some unexplained reason not delivered as stipulated. The Symphony was the colossal 'ninth.' It was first produced at Vienna on May 7, 1824, and its first performance in England took place at the Philharmonic Society's concert on March 21, 1825. The announcement in the programme was as follows:

> New Grand Characteristic Sinfonia, MS., with vocal finale, the principal parts to be sung by Madame Caradori, Miss Goodall, Mr. Vaughan and Mr. Phillips; composed expressly for the Society.

Sir George Smart conducted. The performance was not successful, a result due as much to imperfections of the presentment as to the novelty and originality of the work. The Harmonicon said that:

> With all the merits that it unquestionably possesses, it is at least twice as long as it should be; it repeats itself, and the subjects in consequence become weak by reiteration.

The Symphony was not again performed by the Society until 1837, when it was given under the conductorship of Moscheles.

Towards the end of 1826, Beethoven became very ill; he suffered greatly, and the effects of his malady were aggravated by his fear of destitution. In this frame of mind his thoughts turned to his English friends, and on February 22, 1827, he wrote as follows to Moscheles:

My dear Moscheles,

I am sure you will not take it amiss if I trouble you, as well as Sir G. Smart, to whom I enclose a letter, with a request. The affair is briefly as follows: Some years ago the Philharmonic Society in London made a handsome offer to give me a benefit concert. At that time I was not, thank God, in a situation to make it necessary to avail myself of this generous proposal. But affairs are much altered with me at present, when I have been confined three months by a tedious illness,—the dropsy. Schindler will tell you more about it in a letter accompanying this. You have long known my way of life: you know how and by what I live. Writing is at present out of the question, and I might unfortunately become so situated as to be reduced to want. You have not only extensive connections in London, but also considerable influence with the Philharmonic Society. I beg that you will do what you can to induce them again to consider their intention, and put it soon into execution. My enclosed letter to Sir George Smart is to the same purport, as well as one to Mr. Stumpff, which is already despatched. I entreat you to forward this to Sir George, and to unite with him and my other friends in London to effect this object. Even dictating becomes painful to me, so much exhausted do I feel. Make my compliments to your amiable wife, and be assured I shall always remain

Your friend,

Beethoven.

Pray answer me soon, in order that I may know if I have anything to hope.

As early as March 1, 1827, Moscheles and Mr. Stumpff had written to inform him of the sensation excited among his admirers in London, by his first letter; and the former afterwards wrote to the following effect:

> 'The Society resolved to express their goodwill and lively sympathy, by requesting your acceptance of one hundred pounds sterling (one thousand florins), to provide the necessary comforts and conveniences during your illness. This money will be paid to your order, by Mr. Rau, of the house of Eskeles, either in separate sums, or all at once, as you may desire.'

Moscheles added that the Philharmonic Society were willing to extend their good offices still further, and that Beethoven had only to write if he needed their assistance. The following letter was received in reply:

18th March [1827].

I know not how in words to describe the feelings with which I have read yours of the 1st. I am deeply sensible of the generosity with which the Philharmonic Society has almost anticipated my request; and I beg my heartfelt thanks for their kind sympathy and distinguished liberality. I have found myself compelled to apply for the whole sum of one thousand florins, as I was just under the unpleasant necessity of raising money, which would have occasioned me fresh embarrassment. With regard to the concert which the Society intend to arrange for my benefit, I trust they will not relinquish that noble design, and beg that they will deduct the one hundred pounds, which they already have sent me, from the profits. Should after that any surplus be left, and the Society be kindly willing to bestow it upon me, I hope to have it in my power to evince my gratitude, by composing for them either a symphony, which already lies sketched on my desk, or a new overture or anything else the Society may prefer. May heaven grant me my health soon again, that I may be able to prove to the generous English how well I can appreciate their sympathy with my melancholy situation! Your noble conduct can never be forgotten by me; and I beg you to return my thanks in particular to Sir George Smart and Mr. Stumpff.

With the highest esteem, yours,

(Signed) Beethoven.

On March 24, Schindler wrote:

'He is conscious of his approaching end, for yesterday he said to me and Breuning, "Plaudite amici, Comœ dia finita est."

'The last few days have been memorable ones. He sees the approach of death with the most perfect tranquillity of soul and real Socratic wisdom. Yesterday we were so fortunate as to finish the business of the will. Three days after the receipt of your last, he was much excited, and would have his sketch of the tenth Symphony brought to him, concerning the plan of which he talked to me a great deal. It was destined for the Philharmonic Society, and according to the form which it assumed in his morbid imagination it was to be a musical leviathan, compared with which his other grand symphonies would be merely trifling performances.'

On March 26, 1827, Beethoven died at Vienna, in the fifty-seventh year of his age. The members of the Society must have received the melancholy news with deep regret, but at least their sorrow was chastened by the reflection that they had done their duty to the greatest composer of their age.

The generous dealings of the Society with Beethoven were pleasingly recognised in 1870 by the gift of a bust of the composer from Frau Linzbauer, as detailed below. We have the pleasure of giving a reproduction of a photograph of the bust with our present number.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY'S BUST OF BEETHOVEN.

The original bust from which our illustration is taken has (says Dr. Cummings) a specially interesting history. It was modelled in 1826 by the famous Viennese sculptor, F. Schaller, who made several drawings of Beethoven's head as preparatory studies for the work, which he executed expressly for Carl Holz, an intimate friend of Beethoven. Holz was a violinist, and very active in making the master's music familiar to the public of Vienna. He expressed himself thoroughly satisfied with the surpassing excellence of the bust, and six other intimates of Beethoven made the following declaration: 'The bust is in every way unique, and the undersigned gentlemen, who were all personally acquainted with Beethoven, hereby certify that it is a remarkable and speaking likeness of the great original.' [Here follow various signatures.]

The bust remained in the possession of Holz until his death in 1858, when it was purchased by Frau Linzbauer, who, as a pupil of Holz, had from her childhood frequently seen and admired it. She, a devout worshipper of Beethoven's genius, resolved that the Philharmonic Society of London, who had so generously assisted Beethoven in his last illness, were the rightful heirs of such a precious memorial of the departed composer. Accordingly she made a will bequeathing it to the Society, but in 1870, on the occasion of the centenary of the composer's birth, she resolved to make the presentation at once. The bust is carefully treasured as one of the most valuable effects of the Philharmonic Society.

Gounod's 'Redemption' is enjoying a remarkable wave of popularity on the Continent. We are informed that performances have taken place or are arranged in the following towns: Charleville (January 28), Geneva (February 10), Calais (March 10), Le Havre (April 4), Aix-en-Provence) (April 15), Montauban (April 20), Séez (July 2), and Paris.

A NEW SONG-WRITER: JOSEPH MARX.

By Ernest Newman.

Hugo Wolf has been dead only a few years, and already some of the contemporary criticisms upon him seem quite antiquated, especially that as to the difficulty of his accompaniments. The fact that the same thing was said of Schubert's songs in their own day ought to have been a warning. In the song, as in orchestral music, technical difficulties exist only to be overcome; and we owe a good three-fourths of our progress in both fields to the composers who have persisted in setting the players what appeared at the time to be impossible tasks. If any one to-day wishes to have the comfortable assurance that Wolf's pianoforte parts are really quite easy, he may be recommended to get some of the songs of Joseph Marx and play through them at sight. He has out-Wolfed Wolf as Wolf out-Schuberted Schubert; and in another few years, no doubt, another new song-writer will out-Marx Marx. It does not mean that Marx writes outrageously for the pianoforte any more than Wolf or Schubert did; it simply means that the ordinary pianoforte amateur must improve his technique as the ordinary orchestral player has done, first under the stimulus of Wagner, then under that of Strauss.

I do not, however, wish to convey the impression that Joseph Marx is notable only for the fulness of the pianoforte accompaniments to his songs, or that many of them are not simplicity itself. I know nothing of him except that he has published two sets of 'Lieder und Gesänge,' the former containing twenty-eight, the latter—so far as my knowledge of them goes—nine songs.* They are almost all of them remarkable in some degree, and many of them show the composer to be a musical poet of unusual distinction. The gratifying thing is that coming so soon after Wolf he should show hardly a trace of Wolfian influence. His individuality is indeed a pronounced one, as is shown incidentally in the choice of poems that as a rule avoid the beaten lyrical track that so many German singers have made familiar to us. It is true that, admire him as we may—and my own admiration for him is great—it is too soon yet to hail him as Wolf's authentic and indisputable successor in the great line of descent from Schubert. At present he lacks Wolf's diversity of touch and universality of scope, his insatiable curiosity about man and nature. Marx's imagination, ardent and powerful as it is, moves in a narrower orbit; and, probably as a consequence of this comparative restriction of outlook, his style tends more to uniformity and self-echo than Wolf's. His great predecessor gives the impression of delight in the whole moving pageant of humanity, and joy in the instantaneous noting down of observations and experiences. Marx is less objective and less perceptive. Without being in the least like Brahms in any other respect,

* They are issued by the Schuberthaus-Verlag, Vienna and Leipsic, at prices mostly of 1 mk.—1 mk. 50 pfg. The second set, with one or two exceptions, is not so striking as the first. One would imagine it to consist of the less good songs that the composer had at first withheld from publication.

he resembles him in his avoidance of concrete suggestion in his music. One need not shy at this method of suggestion, for some of the greatest music of the world—Bach's, Schubert's, Wagner's, Wolf's, Strauss's—makes plentiful employment of it. But there are music-lovers who do not always take kindly to it, and these should be attracted to Marx as they are to Brahms. The absence of it perhaps limits the expressiveness of his songs now and then. In Wolf's 'Anakreons Grab,' for instance, how subtly the drooping accompaniment intensifies our visual sense of the old poet's grave and the branches that swing gently above it! Here is realism of the finest kind, not forcing itself upon us for its own sake, inviting us to compare it point by point with its original, but adding some imaginative suffusion—half musical, half visual—to the texture of the poetic idea, and so extending the range of this by association, and adding a new glow to the colours of it. Marx seems to lack this faculty, or to set little store by it. In the 'Japanisches Regenlied' he seems now and then to be making a tentative effort at characterisation, but it is so slight that one may be mistaken in imagining the intention ever to have been present. In 'Regen,' however (a setting of a German translation of Paul Verlaine's 'Il pleure dans mon cœur'), he has clearly aimed at this suggestive reinforcement of the poetic idea by quasi-realistic figures of accompaniment, and with only moderate success. We know how delicately Debussy has heightened the melancholy effect of the words and the music by the softly-pattering pianoforte figures; and we can imagine what Wolf would have done with a device of the kind had he set the song. Marx's attempt at suggestion is somewhat heavy and unconvincing; and from the almost complete absence of anything of this kind in the other songs we may infer that he only experimented with it here because he guessed that it would be expected of him, but with little love for it.

He is pre-eminently a harmonic and contrapuntal thinker, which of course accounts for the tropical luxuriance of some of his pianoforte accompaniments, as it does for those of Max Reger. Conservative minds will no doubt regret this latest manifestation of what they take to be a deadly malady eating away the vitals of the modern song. Their ideal is a symmetrical, self-consistent, self-contained melody floating with more or less detachment upon an accompaniment that, however beautiful it may be in itself, is after all the subordinate factor in the whole. We have the ideal embodied in the old mot about the statue and the pedestal, and, more recently, in Brahms's dictum—lately revived by Sir Charles Stanford—that one test of a good song is the way it reads when we cover up the inner parts with the hand, leaving only the vocal melody and the pianoforte bass showing. With all respect, there are hundreds of good songs to which the test is inapplicable; and it will become less and less applicable as song-composers develop their harmonic resources. No music-lover would say a word in disparagement of the purely melodic, or mainly melodic, types of song, as they may be called; but there is room for another type,—and not merely room, but imperative necessity. The more subtle, profound, and wide-reaching the song becomes in its psychology, the more will composers have to rely on harmonic suggestion; and this inevitably means altering the balance of power between the two factors. It is the pianoforte, as the instrument with the wider and more varied range of utterance, that must take upon itself more than half the burden of expression, and the voice must be content with less than half. It is beside the mark to cry out that this is not song-writing. It may not be song-writing as it was conceived in days when the quasi-symphonic possibilities of the pianoforte accompaniment were not realised; but it is the only kind of song-writing that can give to certain poems the full musical intensity of which they are capable. It is futile to quarrel over names; whether a piece of work like Wolf's 'Geh', Geliebter,' or his 'Auf einer Wanderung,' or Strauss's 'Pilgers Morgenlied,'* can be called a 'song' or not in the sense that Schubert's 'Ave Maria' or Schumann's 'Du bist wie eine Blume' is a song does not matter in the least; they are great and moving combinations of poetry and music, expressible in no other way than this, and that is all that matters. The full conception of the song is no more exhausted for us by Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and others, than the full conception of the drama was exhausted by the Greeks for the Elizabethans, or by the Elizabethans for us of to-day.

No sensible modern composer will throw away the infinite possibilities of expression afforded by the pianoforte in order to comply with some imaginary rule of song-writing, and Marx certainly does not do so. His harmonic idiom is among the richest of our time. It is true that he is a little over-fond of one or two modulations, and that he is apt to fall at the end of his songs into a certain uniformity of device. The climax in 'Hat dich die Liebe berührt,' 'Maienblüten,' 'Frage und Antwort,' 'September morgen,' and other songs is built up in the same way, by a constant piling-up of much the same kind of harmonic effect. But for all that he handles his harmonic masses with great freedom, power and subtlety, moving easily through the most complex mazes. It may be, perhaps, that he occasionally asks of both instrument and player more than they can reasonably be expected to do; but these are generous errors—perhaps of youth—and will readily be forgiven him in consideration of the riches he is pouring out. He is fond, too, of a semi-contrapuntal method of working; he loves to play off against each other different melodic and harmonic sequences in the two hands, thus frequently giving an inexpressible fulness and sineweiness to the texture. Some of the passages of this kind, and those in which a distinct melodic line has to be brought out in different parts of successive harmonies, are by no means easy to suggest adequately at first. Passages like the following, for example (from 'Wie einst'), seem at first sight to be conceived orchestrally rather than pianistically; but careful playing will realise the composer's idea:

Marx sees and feels intensely rather than widely, which is in itself a reason for the copiousness of his harmonic vocabulary. He can, it is true, write with great and effective simplicity when the occasion demands it,—as in 'Ein junger Dichter denkt an die Geliebte,' the 'Japanisches Regenlied,' and the 'Marienlied'; but even here, though the texture may be less compact than elsewhere, it is still rich and full-flavoured. At other times he riots in harmonic colour, without, however, losing himself for a moment or obscuring the steadily progressing lines of the song. One surmises from a verbal hint here and there that the Chopin influence has been strong with him; he loves harmony, indeed, as Chopin loved it, for the sweetness and fragrance and changing colour, as of some rare ointment, that it yields beneath the hands; he loves to pass it through his fingers as the jewel-lover lifts up and lets fall a handful of multi-coloured gems. Occasionally, perhaps, he is too engrossed with the beauty of harmony for its own sake; he spreads this part of the fabric so widely that it puts a kind of drag upon the vocal melody, which is often compelled to move in longer and slower notes, with a consequent partial loss of incisiveness and of rhythmic interest. This accounts, too, for the impression of lack of variety in the style that some of the songs give us. But with Marx, as with Wolf, though the main thinking seems to the casual observer to be done in the pianoforte part, and the vocal melody to be an after-thought, this latter, on examination, proves to have a logic and a raison d'être of its own. This is notably so in perhaps the finest, as it is certainly the richest in texture, of all the songs, the 'Barcarole,'—a splendidly conceived scheme, splendidly carried out on an unusually large scale. The richness of his harmonic writing, and the admirable way in which it gets to the heart of the poem, can be seen again to perfection in the 'O süsser Tod' and the 'Hat dich die Liebe berührt.'

Marx's genius, as I have said, appears to be intensive rather than extensive, if one may judge him as a whole from these songs. Many of the poems cover much the same field of emotion,—or at all events he views them from much the same emotional standpoint; and he elaborates and extends the musical expression of the feeling to the utmost possible. This is perhaps not always desirable; one occasionally feels that Schubert or Wolf, for example, would have given us the concentrated essence of the song in less space and with fewer notes than Marx requires, though it would be hard to say, indeed, where he has been excessive. Some of the songs are masterpieces of ease and concision, such as the 'Marienlied' and 'Wie einst,'—the latter in particular being a most beautiful specimen of what may be called the lyric prose of music. And although a brooding intensity seems on the whole Marx's most characteristic emotional note, there are ample evidences even among this handful of songs that his scope is wider than this. He has at his command the fantastic, the ironic humorous ('Warnung'), the healthily-glad ('Sommerlied'), and the melancholy-bizarre ('Valse de Chopin'). It is surely impossible for a composer with so keen a poetical sense and such easy command of musical expression not to extend the range of his idiom as he grows older, and to refine out of it the slight alloy of monotony one notices in it here and there at present. His work, too, suggests an imagination too powerful and aspiring to be content for ever with no larger medium than that of the song with pianoforte accompaniment. In any case his next songs will be awaited with interest. Anyone who wishes to study him may be recommended to begin with the 'Barcarole,' 'Wie einst,' 'Maienblüten,' 'Sommerlied,' 'Valse de Chopin,' 'Marienlied,' 'Japanisches Regenlied,' 'Ein junger Dichter denkt an die Geliebte,' and 'O süsser Tod' from the first set of songs, and 'Der Rauch' from the second set. Some of the songs are provided with English versions that, unfortunately, are not models of their kind.

THE SHORT MASSES OF BACH.

By H. C. Colles.

The trenchant criticisms which Spitta and others have passed upon the four short Masses by Bach, each consisting of a 'Kyrie' and a 'Gloria' only, have no doubt done much to banish them from public performance, and the very natural tendency to concentrate attention upon the best alone, as shown in the colossal Mass in B minor, has done the rest. Nevertheless, we had every reason to be grateful to Mr. Fagge and the London Choral Society for bringing forward the Mass in F (on Wednesday, February 14), which of the four is best able to hold its own because of the profoundly beautiful feeling of its 'Kyrie,' one of the few movements, and quite the most powerful among them, which were newly written by Bach for these Masses. The majority of the movements were taken from church cantatas—a list of them is to be found in any of the standard works on Bach—and were adapted to the Latin words. It is not the fact of adaptation, but the method—or rather methods, for they are many—with which fault has been found.

This is a convenient moment to glance again at some of them, not in order to repeat or refute the strictures which have been passed, but if possible to see what led Bach to treat his work in this particular way. We may take it for granted that he wanted the Masses for some specific purpose, either to send to the Catholic Court at Dresden, or for special performance in his own Church; it matters little which. Often it is quite easy to see why he drew upon certain works rather than others for these pasticcios: an obvious similarity in the feeling of the words would make music which he had written for a German cantata quite suitable in feeling to its position in the Latin Mass. The soprano aria, 'Qui tollis peccata mundi,' in the F major Mass, taken from 'Weh, der Seele' in the cantata 'Herr deine Augen sehen nach dem Glauben,' is a typical case. Where as here the general mood merely determines the melodic idiom, and the movement is developed on purely abstract lines, it only needed the easy alteration of the vocal declamation to make its new use equally apposite.

One gets a shock however when, turning to the very next aria, 'Quoniam Tu solus sanctus,' one discovers it derived from a movement in the same cantata with the startlingly contradictory words, 'Erschrecke doch, du all zu sich're Seele, Denk was sich würdig, zähle der Sünden Joch.' Must we think after all that having taken down one cantata from its shelf Bach merely went on drawing upon it rather than reach for another? One might come to such a conclusion by a hasty comparison of the words. Closer inspection of the music shows, however, that the very daring of the thing attracted Bach to the experiment. Having set his thoughts to the contemplation of the burden of sin, he superimposed the idea of the Only Holy One upon his setting; sweeping away the original vocal melody in which 'Erschrecke doch' is expressed in broken and angular phrases, he has placed instead of it a smoothly flowing and diatonic one, retaining the original oboe obbligato. We may find that the version in the Mass is the less interesting, that in result it is to some extent a spoiled movement; but Bach did not find it so, because in devising it he was absorbed by the mental problem it offered. He evidently felt these compilations to be in some respects an evolution from the cantatas.

Another instance may be named in the alto aria, 'Domine Fili unigenite,' of the G minor Mass, which, though beginning similarly to 'Du Herr, du krönst allein das Jahr mit deinem Gut,' from the cantata 'Es wartet alles auf Dich,' is considerably extended beyond its first limits of expression when the words 'Qui tollis peccata' are reached. The modulation of the happy principal theme into the minor key at the Coda is one of those tender touches of feeling which come in Bach's works to remind us that, however much he may concentrate upon problems and ideas, he is never working with his head alone. The bold opening to the 'Cum sancto Spiritu' in the G major Mass, with its majestic modulations through extraneous keys, is another touch of spontaneous expression which shows that Bach remembered with Herrick that 'the best of all's the heart.'

Nevertheless, that quality does not shine sufficiently constantly in the two Masses in G major and minor to make us wish for their public performance, at any rate while the cantatas from which they are drawn are as little known as they are at present. The Mass in A major is much more remarkable. In the first place, like the one in F, it has a beautiful and original 'Kyrie,' though written in a very different style. The most striking feature of the 'Kyrie' is the quasi-recitative in canon with which all four voices of the chorus make the strenuous appeal, 'Christe eleison.' The effect of this episode, standing as it does between two beautiful but more formal movements, is peculiarly personal, like the cry of the individual heard amongst the general prayer of the congregation. The 'Kyrie' without the 'Gloria' might well be given in concert performance. Perhaps the London Choral Society will find a place for it in some future programme. The Mass in A also contains the most curious—we might say the most vandalistic—of all Bach's adaptations in the first chorus of the 'Gloria.' It is taken from a wonderful aria with chorus in the cantata, 'Halt im Gedänkniss,' in which, after an agitated instrumental symphony, a bass solo as the voice of Christ enters with the words, 'Friede sei mit euch,' to which the choir respond with 'Wohl uns, Jesus, hilf uns kampfen,' and similar ejaculations, delivered with the urgency which Bach was so well able to throw into his contrapuntal vocal parts. The spirit of the movement is fully described by Sir Hubert Parry, who emphasises the fact that its musical form is the direct outcome of the dramatic situation imagined by Bach in the cantata. It is evident that this is the very last kind of movement likely to bear any sort of transplanting, yet it is equally evident why Bach seized upon it for such treatment. The idea of the Christ bringing peace to His servants is one with that of the Angel's song at Bethlehem, and Bach was fascinated by the task of identifying the 'Friede sei mit euch' with the 'Et in terra pax.' A composer of to-day might recognise the identity of idea by the quotation of a single theme, but Bach regarded his work so much as a single and indivisible organism that such a treatment would not satisfy him. Having decided that the first bass solo must belong to the 'Et in terra pax,' he had next to find a place for the 'Gloria in excelsis Deo,' and he did so by weaving the chorus skilfully into the initial symphony without destroying its shape. The other words had also to be fitted, and this was done by assigning 'Adoramus Te' and 'Gratias agimus' to music which had been repetitions of 'Friede sei mit euch,' making the last into a contrapuntal chorus in place of a bass solo to form the climax of the movement. The technical skill with which it was done, as well as the very patent fact that the result was and could only be an artistic failure, have been amply commented upon by such critics as Spitta and Schweitzer. What they appear to have missed, or at any rate have not emphasized, is that this and the other curious experiments in compilation of these Masses throw considerable light on Bach's intensely introspective way of working—that his mistakes, like many of his greatest successes, were the direct outcome of it, and open up a valuable channel to those who delight in exploring into his unfathomable mind.

TEMPO RUBATO.

By Reginald Gatty.

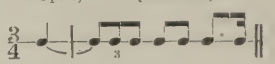
What is 'tempo rubato'? An inquiry into the subject brings to light four different uses of the phrase, and we propose in the present article to compare them together, as this will be of service in attempting to clear up a more or less ambiguous point in music. Beginning, for convenience' sake, with the German authority, Riemann, we find that he defines the phrase in his 'Musik-lexikon' (7th ed., Leipsic, 1909, Art. 'Rubato') as 'The free treatment of the tempo in especially expressive and impassioned passages when the usual insensible stringendo-calando belonging to the nuances of phrasing stands out forcibly.' Here we find it employed in a general sense of tempo-modification, with especial reference to the interpretative side of music, and in this sense it is frequently to be met with in contemporary musical writings.*

When we refer to Grove's 'Dictionary' (Arts. 'Rubato' and 'Tempo Rubato') the phrase is first of all applied to the introduction of cross-accents into a composition, when phrases suggestive of duple-time rhythm are introduced into triple-time bars and vice versâ, a meaning quite distinct of course, from the foregoing one. The second explanation given has reference, like Riemann's, to variations in the rate of performance, but with this important proviso, that the variation must be of such a character that the general length of each bar remains the same. This principle of what may be termed 'compensating values' is stated both by Fuller Maitland and Franklin Taylor. The former says distinctly (Art. 'Rubato') that this practice 'consists of a slight ad libitum slackening or quickening of the time in any passage, in accordance with the unchangeable rule that in all such passages any bar in which this licence is taken must be of exactly the same length as the other bars in the movement, so that if the first part of the bar be played slowly, the other part must be taken quicker than the ordinary time of the movement to make up for it; and vice versâ, if the bar be hurried at the beginning, there must be a rallentando at the end.' Nor is Franklin Taylor less clear. He writes (Art. 'Tempo Rubato'): 'The term expresses the opposite of strict time, and indicates a style of performance in which some portion of the bar is executed at a quicker or slower tempo than the general rate of movement, the balance being restored by a corresponding slackening or quickening of the remainder.'†

In his 'Technique and expression in pianoforte playing' (Novello, 1897), however, after giving a similar definition, he adds (p. 73), 'but it should be observed that any independent accompaniment to a rubato phrase must always keep strict time, and it is, therefore, quite possible that no note of a rubato melody will fall exactly together with its corresponding note in the accompaniment, except, perhaps, the first note in each bar.' He then quotes as 'a good example of rubato melody with strict accompaniment' a couple of bars containing three irregular groups of notes out of Chopin's Ballade in F minor, Op. 52.‡ But, as Dannreuther points out (Grove's 'Dictionary,' Art. 'Chopin'), Chopin's rubato was always with a strict accompaniment. Wilhelm von Lenz writes ('Die grossen Pianoforte-virtuosen unserer Zeit,' Berlin, 1872, p. 47) he often heard Chopin say 'The left hand is the conductor: it must not give way or vacillate—do with your right hand what you like and can.' And Liszt said to the Russian pianist Neilissov, at Weimar, in 1871 (id. ib.), 'Look at these trees, the wind plays in the leaves; develops life in them; the tree remains the same; that is Chopin-rubato!'

Moreover, although Dannreuther ('Musical Ornamentation,' Novello, ii. p. 161) quotes Chopin as saying, 'The graces are part of the text, and therefore part of the time; they must be justly fitted in—and there lies the trouble!' his rubato did not really apply to passages with irregular groups of notes, as will be seen by a reference to his works. To the best of our knowledge Chopin only wrote the direction 'rubato' nine times in his compositions. Seven of those nine times the rhythms of the melodies are the following simple figures:

Op. 6, No. 1 (Mazurka).



Op. 6, No. 2 (Mazurka).

Op. 7, No. 1 (Mazurka).

Op. 7, No. 3 (Mazurka).

Op. 15, No. 3 (Nocturne).

(languido e rubato.)

* Paderewski, in his chapter on 'Tempo Rubato' in Henry T. Finck's 'Success in Music' (London: Murray, 1910), also adopts this meaning of the term (p. 457 et seq.).

† In an article on 'Rhythm and Tempo Rubato' in The Times for April 16, 1910, a distinction is drawn between the tempo-compensation that is effected within the limits of a bar and within the limits of a musical sentence. Paderewski ('Success in Music,' p. 459) rejects the whole principle of compensating values. We have been unable to ascertain how it originated.

‡ The direction 'rubato' is not given at this place, however, in Mertke's complete critical edition (Steingräber, Leipsic), in which all arbitrary alterations or additions and corrupted versions have been expunged after a comparison with the original Paris and London editions.

Op. 24, No. 1 (Mazurka).

Op. 67, No. 3 (Mazurka).

The effect of rubato in these passages is, of course, that of a non-metronomic irregularity of time in the right hand, a regular steady rhythm being maintained in the left. This is proved conclusively by the following passage from Liszt's 'Chopin' (Breitkopf & Härtel, Leipsic, 1879, p. 115), which also gives a vivid description of the effect:

> In his playing the great artist [i.e., Chopin] expressed in a ravishing manner that species of trepidation, sensitive, timid or palpitating, which comes to the heart when one believes oneself in the vicinity of supernatural beings, in the presence of those whom one does not know how to divine, or to grasp, to embrace or to enchant. He always made the melody undulate, like a skiff borne on the bosom of a mighty billow; or, he made it move irresolutely, like an aeriel apparition come unawares to a tangible and palpable world. In his writings he used to indicate this manner of execution which gave such a peculiar stamp to his virtuosity, by the word tempo rubato: a tempo, stolen, broken, a time at once flexible, abrupt and languishing, vacillating like a flame under the breath which stirs it, like the ears of a cornfield undulating under the soft pressure of the warm air, like the tops of trees inclined here and there at the caprice of a sportive breeze.
> But as the word, which taught nothing to those who knew, said nothing to those who did not know, or grasp, or feel, Chopin ceased later to add this direction to his music,† persuaded that if one understood it, it was impossible not to divine this rule of irregularity. Accordingly all his compositions ought to be played with this sort of accentuated, rhythmical (prosodié) rocking, this morbidezza, the secret of which was difficult to grasp if one had not often heard him play.‡

Chopin's rubato, then, has nothing to do with the general rate of tempo of a bar, but refers solely to the intra-bar re-distribution of the time-values of the notes comprising the melody, while the accompaniment maintains its steady rate of progress, and this is the meaning attached to all earlier uses of the expression.

It also means, as we have seen, the indefinite re-distribution of definite time-values. But he was not the first to employ the phrase in this sense. Lemaire, in his French translation of Tosi's 'Opinioni de' Cantori Antichi e Moderni' (Paris, Rothschild, 1874), quotes (p. 126) the following explanation of the term from 'une ancienne méthode de chant,' which points to exactly the same effect as that indicated by Liszt:

> The Italian singers have a manner of delaying the singing, or of losing the precision of the time (l'exactitude de la mesure) at will, while the orchestra continues its prescribed movement (son mouvement donné), which has a great effect, when it is done with taste and when the singer knows how to preserve his balance. One cannot give an example of this effect in singing; it is necessary to observe it in performance. This method may be called vacillare, which means to vacillate, hesitate, falter, waver, be in suspense.

Galliard, too, in a note to his translation of the same book, entitled 'Observations on the Florid Song' (London, 1742, p. 156), says:

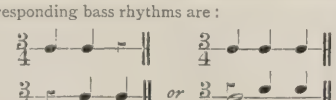
> Our Author has often mentioned Time; the Regard to it, the Strictness of it, and how much it is neglected and unobserv'd. In this Place speaking of stealing the Time, it regards particularly the Vocal, or the Performance on a single Instrument in the Pathetick and Tender; when the Bass goes an exactly regular Pace, the other Part retards or anticipates in a singular Manner, for the Sake of Expression, but after That returns to its Exactness, to be guided by the Bass. Experience and Taste must teach it. A mechanical Method of going on with the Bass will easily distinguish the Merit of the other Manner.

There is, however, no explicit reference to this form of rubato in Tosi's text, and the only definite passages allude to another variety—also on an unfluctuating bass—with which we have now to deal. This kind, akin in nature to that required in the bars of Chopin's music containing irregular groups, came into effect when vocal melodies were varied by the ad libitum introduction of florid passages (passi and passagi) on the part of the singers. Speaking of good taste in singing, Tosi says ('Opinioni de' Cantori,' Bologna, 1723, p. 82; Galliard's translation, p. 129) that it consists 'in the Cantabile, in the putting forth the Voice agreeably, in Appoggiaturas, in Art, and in the true Notion of Graces, going from one Note to another with singular and unexpected Surprises and stealing the Time exactly on the true Motion of the Bass.' (Nell' Intelligenza de Passi, andando da una nota all' altra con singolari, e inaspettati inganni con rubamento di Tempo, e sul MOTO de' Bassi.)

Similarly, in his chapter on passi he says (p. 111, 'Galliard,' p. 175), 'That being govern'd by the rigorous, but necessary, Precepts of Time, they never transgress its regulated Measure, without losing their own Merit' (Che ammaestrato da rigorosi, ma degni precetti del TEMPO non può uscir mai dalle sue regolate misure senza perdere la propria estimazione), adding, as an accessory quality (p. 113, 'Galliard,' p. 177), 'That They be stol'n on the Time to captivate the Soul' (Che sia rubato sul Tempo acciò diletti l' anima).

So far we have been dealing with non-metronomic re-distributions of tempo, but further investigation brings to light the fact that purely metronomic ones were formerly also included in the term. The former, from their nature, eluded precise representation, but we find actual examples as to execution of the other kind. A note in Agricola's German translation of Tosi's work is quoted by Dannreuther ('Musical Ornamentation,' i., p. 36), thus: 'tempo rubare signifies to rob a note of part of its value and add as much to another note, and

* The corresponding bass rhythms are:



† It occurs (Steingräber Edition) four times in Opp. 6 and 7, twice in Opp. 15 and 16 (Rondo in E flat major), and once in Op. 24. Otherwise it is only found in a posthumous Mazurka (Op. 63) and a posthumous Polonaise (G sharp minor).

‡ Lenz says (id., p. 47), 'In the fluctuation of the motion, in this hesitation and timidity (Hangen und Bangen) in the rubato as he understood it, Chopin was enchanting.'

vice versâ,' and is accompanied by the following illustration (Dannreuther's transcription):

But examples of this species of vocal licence, although without the name, occur as early as in Caccini's 'Le nuove musiche' (Venezia, 1602), and if Dannreuther ('Musical Ornamentation,' i., 36) is hardly right in considering their effect that of 'a perfect tempo rubato,' at least as we now understand it, they undoubtedly represent the method in its earliest form. We cite a few examples from the Venice edition:

1 I.e., the notes to be sung with vibrato.

2 The Playford translation (Playford, 'Introductions to the skill of musick,' 7th ed., London, 1674), has 'A'plain fall,' which apparently means a simple method of approaching a cadence.

3 'Double fall' (Playford).

4 'A fall to take breath' (Playford).

5 'Another fall like it' (Playford).

To sum up, it will now be easy to trace the history of the term. Beginning with the signification of metronomic ad libitum variations on a steady bass, it was still retained when the performer introduced non-metronomic variations in the time of the melody, also against a steady accompaniment, at first by the interpolation of extra notes, but afterwards, when the sense of rhythm became more secure, in the execution of simple phrases. During this second period the music so performed had the essential feature quaintly expressed by Tosi (p. 112, 'Galliard,' p. 175) with regard to passi: 'That, being guided by the most refined Art on the Bass, they may There (and no where else) find their Center; there to sport with Delight, and unexpectedly to charm.'* But during the whole of this time music played rubato 'found its centre' on the bass. Then, in more recent years, the phrase took on the meaning of general tempo-variation, first in a limited (Grove), later in a wider sense (Riemann).

For purposes of clearness it would undoubtedly be of advantage if a differentiation of terms could be introduced to designate the various kinds, and the following suggestions are made with this end in view: 'Rubato,' par excellence, might be taken to mean the general tempo-modifications of a performer, for a word is badly wanted to express the idea concisely; 'melodic rubato,' the non-metronomic tempo-variations on a steady bass generally associated with Chopin; and 'metronomic rubato,' the early species that now has only a historic importance. Finally, 'cross-accent rubato' might be used to designate that variety mentioned at the beginning, which refers to the construction and not the interpretation of a melodic phrase.†

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

Not many years ago, in the earlier days of our musical awakening, the sight of a clergyman and musician in discussion would have drawn from any onlooker the fairly safe prophecy that the subject in debate was 'congregational singing.' Signs of warmth on either side would have made the expectation a certainty. Amongst those most vitally concerned the discussion may, for all we know, be still a lively cause of heart-burning; but time has blunted the point of the thorns so far as the merely interested are concerned. Certainly the subject could not formerly be mentioned without the immediate appearance of 'wigs on the green'; whereas now, even at a Church Congress, it may be discussed pro and con. without any display of the less Christian forms of argument. The truth is, of course, that, like so many adjustable matters which we English shelve until they become burning questions, what should have been a simple and logical debate between moderate men was allowed to degenerate into a dispute between partisans. The combatants quickly occupied two indefensible positions, and a battle royal began which did and could reach no conclusion: for the clergy insisted that every member of a congregation had an inalienable right to sing—apparently wherever and however he liked, and the musician claimed that Church music would inevitably disappear unless it was left to those qualified and trained to perform it.

In the present interval of comparative calm—it may be called an interval since there are signs that before long the sand in the arena will again be reddened—it may be worth while to bring forward some of the elementary data of the subject: for, as in the case of all complex questions, there are certain preliminaries on which agreement can and should be reached before any definite conclusion can be arrived at on the larger issues. And the first of such preliminary questions to be answered is this: For what purpose is music enlisted into the service of the Church?

* Che guidato dal più finito Artificio sul Basso ivi (e non altrove) ei trova il suo centro; ivi scherza con diletta, e innaspettato innamora.

† Niecks says ('Frederick Chopin.' London: Novello, 1888, vol. ii., p. 102): 'Often, no doubt, people mistook for tempo rubato what in reality was a suppression or displacement of accent, to which kind of playing the term is indeed sometimes applied.' It seems highly probable that the use of the phrase to indicate 'cross-accents' really arose out of this misunderstanding.

To this question there would appear to be three, and only three, possible answers, though a caveat may here be entered against considering these answers mutually exclusive. They are as follow:

(1.) That an offering may be made to the Almighty of the best that our talents and industry can supply in an art traditionally considered divine;

(2.) That, by a like manifestation, the listeners' minds may be elevated and purged of mundane influences; and

(3.) That the worshipper may add his own iota to the general pæan or prayer.

The first answer will, with qualifications, be conceded in general by both sides. Limits may assuredly be defined as to the particular portions of the service included in such an oblation; and also doubt may be expressed as to whether it is desirable, where poor material produces but inferior results, to make any public presentation of such endeavours. That is to say, as a practical issue, the congregation may well protest against every note of music falling under this head, whilst cheerfully conceding, say, an anthem and the Canticles; and the musical minority, going further, may well protest, where the choir is manifestly poor, against even the shortest anthem. The efforts of the humble are admittedly dear to the Almighty; but when they have not yet passed that stage at which they are really distressing to the musical portion of the congregation, then they may well, with a truer humility, be held in reserve.

A kindred qualification may be made in assenting to our second definition. Leaving aside the occasional expert in the congregation, it may reasonably be demanded that a performance meant to edify and elevate must have reached a standard acceptable to average musical listeners. A ragged performance of a sentimental anthem (and there are only too many every Sunday of the year) may have its effect for good on the more crudely emotional souls, but the balance is more than redressed by the very real disgust experienced by the ever-increasing number of musically-intelligent people. It is an apparent paradox, but none the less actually true, that whereas churches are nowadays vyeing with each other in the elaborateness of their music, many really musical church attendants are earnestly seeking out where they may find the plainest service.

But it is, of course, in our third answer that the crux of the question lies. If we grant that a good choir may reserve for itself, for offering or edification, definite portions of the music, we must allow that in the normal service there are places where the congregation is expected to take part. We say 'normal,' because the discussion is not affected by the fact that in a cathedral service, where great trouble and expense are incurred to secure something like perfection, the choir may rightly claim a monopoly. But in normal services, if there are places in which the congregation ought to join, what restrictions are to be placed on indiscriminate singing? There should be little difficulty in determining, in any given church, exactly where these places occur. It is not a question of general law, nor of special compromise, but simply one depending on the standard of the choir relative to the musical intelligence of the listener: for a choir that might well be entrusted with an anthem at Little Puddleton would cut a sorry figure in, say, Leeds Parish Church. Having settled this point, the argument should then approach the question of the individual: May every one who chooses sing without let or hindrance? The possession of a tolerable voice and a fairly sensitive ear will readily be passed as a qualification, though a fruitful discussion may well follow as to whether those who claim the right to sing to the Almighty do not thereby incur the duty of improving the voice given them for the purpose. And this consideration is the more serious when we are dealing with those numerous singers who, instead of joining in the melody, insist on extemporising a part—bass, tenor, alto, or (worst of all) 'seconds.'

We are now left with the really bad voices on our hands, and in dealing with them the problem reaches its acutest phase. Unfortunately, it is a fact, as Spencer points out, that every feeling is a muscular stimulus, and that every state of mental excitement must have its reflex action in muscular movement. No body of people, that is, can possibly take their true share in any religious service without being under the necessity of relieving their feelings by muscular reaction. It would, of course—we speak without flippancy, merely to drive home the physiological necessity—answer quite well if they left church and ran a mile, or spent a few minutes swinging Indian clubs. But the fact remains that muscular reaction of some sort must occur; and singing, besides fulfilling this condition, is traditionally and reasonably considered a seemly attribute of church worship. The possessors of bad voices may be argued with, singly or collectively, on the possibility of improving them, and on their duty in that direction, on modesty and reticence, on consideration of the feelings of others, on a dozen various mitigations; but it is useless to talk of sequestrating their right to sing without taking cognizance of the iron physical law we have stated.

And it is this law which renders null and void the common argument that, as they allow one man to say their prayers for them (assuming their share by the final 'Amen'), so they should allow the trained voices to sing for them. Fortunately, the singing of a mass of people may always be magnificent, in spite of the inferiority of the units; but lest this fact should encourage laziness and self-satisfaction the words of a wise and thoughtful man may be recalled: 'As to the privilege of singing, it seems to have been generally overlooked that, by a universal law of morals, no right whatever can be claimed by those who do not qualify themselves to exercise it. The right to join in a musical service is acquired by submitting to a musical training, and is forfeited at once by any man, however highly endowed with natural gifts, who will not be at the pains to cultivate either his voice or his ear.'

Occasional Notes.

In our last issue we were able to give only bare mention to the fact that Mr. Richard Buhlig, in the course of his recital at Æolian Hall on January 23, played the 'Drei Klavierstücke,' by Herr Arnold Schönberg, which Mr. Frederick Corder dealt with so caustically in our December issue. We remind our readers that to our commonplace intelligences these manifestations of the newest Viennese spirit seem to be constructed, with fiendish ingenuity, out of the very antithesis and negation of music. It was not our privilege to be present at this fascinating exhibition. It must have been a memorable moment when the habitual and oft soporitic decorum of the pianoforte recital was so far forgotten that, in the words of the Westminster Gazette:

> Beginning with knitted brows, obviously denoting a stern resolve to pluck the heart out of the Schönbergian mystery or perish in the attempt, Mr. Buhlig's hearers could be perceived to be relaxing their efforts one by one as the impossibility of the undertaking became more and more apparent, until finally concentration gave way to mirth, and by the time the last piece of the set was reached more or less ill-suppressed laughter was general all over the hall.

The critic of the Observer treated the matter with graver concern. He said that the composer was > a veritable apostle of self-sufficiency, and his doctrines based on the utter humiliation of all reasonableness and the denial of any registered ancestry to the union of sounds on which is woven the fabric of modern music. It was quite impossible to say whether Mr. Buhlig was playing the fool with the piano and placing his fingers, singly or in combination, on notes that had nothing to do with each other, or whether he was deliberately distorting, for purposes of ill-conceived humour, the work of a genius.

'As the Three Klavierstücke are,' he added, 'unfortunately published, the latter conclusion is not permissible!' One suggestion creeps into our mind. The Associated Board and similar bodies are accused of conventionality in their choice of examination pieces. Now is their chance to refute the charge!

The Quinlan Opera Company, numbering 150, left Liverpool on January 22 on board the 'Anchises' for Cape Town, where they will play for some weeks. On May 10 they leave South Africa on the 'Ascanius, due to arrive at Melbourne on June 10, and will then proceed by special train to Sydney. The return journey starts on August 17 by the Orient liner 'Osterley,' due to arrive in England on September 29. Whilst abroad the company do not intend to produce any new works, although they will present 'Rigoletto' and other operas which will be fresh to Australia.

The principal feature of the spring concert season in London will undoubtedly be the series of choral and orchestral concerts organized by Mr. Balfour Gardiner. With the exception of four numbers the programmes are made up from the works of British composers. That of the first concert, on March 13, is remarkable for new works and new forms of 'laying out.' It is as follows:

* 'Enchanted summer' ... ... Bax.
(Words from Shelley's 'Prometheus Unbound.') For two Soprano voices, chorus, and orchestra.

Dance Rhapsody for orchestra ... ... Delius.

(a) Irish tune from co. Londonderry Grainger.
Folk-song setting for unaccompanied chorus, without words.

* (b) 'Father and daughter' ... ... Grainger.
Færö dancing ballad set for five men's single voices, double mixed chorus, strings, brass, and mandoline and guitar band.

* 'News from Whydah' ... Balfour Gardiner.
Ballad by John Masefield, set for chorus and orchestra.

* Three Kipling settings ... ... Grainger.

(a) Morning song in the Jungle
For unaccompanied chorus.

(b) 'Tiger-Tiger'
For unaccompanied men's chorus.

(c) 'We have fed our sea for a thousand years'
For chorus, brass, and strings.

* 'The Baron of Brackley' ... ... Bell.
Border ballad set for chorus and orchestra.

The London Choral Society.

The New Symphony Orchestra.

* First time of performance.

On March 27, the New Symphony Orchestra will play Elgar's second Symphony under the composer's direction, and give the first performance of a 'Festival Overture' by Mr. Bax, under the direction of Mr. Balfour Gardiner; Mr. Grainger will play Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Pianoforte concerto. On April 17, the Oriana Madrigal Society, conducted by Mr. C. Kennedy Scott, will sing madrigals, rounds and part-songs (including Mr. Balfour Gardiner's 'The stage coach'). The New Symphony Orchestra will produce a 'Mock Morris,' for seven-part string orchestra, by Mr. Percy Grainger, and Dr. Vaughan Williams's second and third 'Norfolk' Rhapsodies. The programme of the fourth concert, on May 1, is as follows:

'With the wild geese' ... ... Hamilton-Harty.

English dance No. 1 ... ... Cyril Scott.

'Helen of Kirkconnel' ... ... Cyril Scott.
(Ballad for baritone and orchestra.)
Mr. Frederic Austin.

* Oriental Suite, 'Beni-Mora' ... Von Holst.

(Ballad for baritone and orchestra.)
(Mr. Frederic Austin.)

* 'English dance' ... ... Grainger.

The New Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Balfour Gardiner and several of the composers will share the work of conducting.

* First time of performance.

Altogether British composers can claim less and less credit for being jolly. Their opportunities improve every season. Not always have there been Beechams and Balfour Gardiners to give them a helping hand. Another notable instance comes to hand in addition to that set out above. If Mr. Hammerstein's promises come to fruition—and he is the last man to abandon them except in face of the impossible—the British composer most to be congratulated at the present moment is Mr. Josef Holbrooke. His great Celtic trilogy of opera, 'The cauldron of Annwm,' has, in spite of the publication and much discussion of 'Dylan,' led a somewhat shadowy existence. Mr. Hammerstein has positively undertaken to produce the first section, 'The Children of Don,' with the 'finest cast obtainable on this planet.' The composer thinks, moreover, that the ultimate production by Mr. Hammerstein of 'Dylan' and 'Brangwyn,' the second and third sections, is not too large a conception to be banished from his hopes.

Many performances of works by living British composers have been given recently on the Continent. Elgar's Violin concerto has been played by Kreisler in Vienna, by Ysaye in Bremen, Berlin and Königsberg, by Telmanyi in Berlin, and by Wollgandt in Leipsic. His second Symphony has been given in Munich and Vienna, and the first is announced to be played twice in Copenhagen, in March. The Overture to Stanford's 'Stabat Mater,' Parry's 'Symphonic variations,' and Elgar's 'Sea-pictures' (Madame Kirkby Lunn) have been performed at a Gürzenich Concert in Cologne. Bantock's symphonic-poem 'Dante and Beatrice' has been played in Mainz, and his Omar Khàyyam has been performed in Vienna.

At a recent meeting of the general committee of the Birmingham Triennial Festival, the programme of the next Festival, to be held on October 1, 2, 3 and 4 this year, was decided. The novelties will be Sir Edward Elgar's 'We are the music-makers,' a work by Dr. Walford Davies on the subject of the 'Song of St. Francis,' a new orchestral work by Mr. Granville Bantock, and a new Symphony by Sibelius. The following works were also chosen: 'The Messiah,' 'Elijah,' Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion, 'The Apostles,' Verdi's Requiem, Brahms's Requiem, Dvorák's Te Deum, Bach's 'Be not afraid,' and concertos with Herr Rosenthal and Señor Casals as soloists.

By the time this appears, Mr. Ernest Denhof's enterprising season of opera in the provinces will have commenced at Hull. The répertoire consists of 'The Mastersingers,' 'Tristan,' 'The Flying Dutchman,' 'Orpheus' and 'Elektra,' the last-named being given in English for the first time. After leaving Hull, the company proceeds to Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, Glasgow and Edinburgh.

THE THANKSGIVING SERVICE AT ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

Our King and Queen have again visited the great Metropolitan Cathedral to offer thanks for a national benefit, and, as on the occasion in June of last year, music held a high place in the solemn service. The conditions offered by St. Paul's for a musical service, whether from the point of view of acoustical effect or of the admirable arrangements that are possible, are unique, and the thanks of all are especially due to Sir George Martin (the conductor-in-chief) for the manner in which his all-important and onerous duties were accomplished. The splendid choir of the Cathedral was largely augmented, those present including members of the choirs of the Chapel Royal, St. James's, Westminster Abbey, St. George's Chapel, Windsor, the St. Paul's Sunday Evening Choir, and the Special Service Choir, besides many others. A full orchestra, and the organ, perfectly played by Mr. Charles Macpherson, provided the instrumental accompaniments. Before the service, a fine rendering of the first four movements of Mendelssohn's 'Lobgesang' was given by the orchestra, under Sir Walter Parratt's conductorship, who also directed a performance of Sir Edward Elgar's 'Imperial March' at the conclusion of the service. The service-music comprised the National Anthem, sung at the entry of their Majesties, Sir George Martin's noble setting of the Te Deum in A major (composed for the Diamond Jubilee Service), Beethoven's 'Hallelujah' chorus from 'The Mount of Olives,' and a hymn. The inclusion of Sir George's Te Deum was a happy idea, for not only is the work set out on just those broad lines which such an occasion demands, but the memory of the great rejoicing which produced it was revived in the most happy and suitable manner. We doubt if anything more fitting could have been chosen. The 'Hallelujah' too made a great effect, and if it be true that the introduction be intended to suggest swinging censers, the rest was surely as suggestive of a festival. The moments of waiting before the arrival of the Royal worshippers on these occasions are remembered by all who are privileged to be present for an indefinable sensation of glorious expectancy, and never was this more vividly experienced. And when at last was heard in the distance the cheering of the people in the streets and the strains of the National Anthem, given by the military bands, all present felt a thrill of thankfulness for the successful outcome of their Majesties' momentous journey, and its triumphant conclusion. At this moment a brilliant fanfare, composed by Lieut. Dr. Mackenzie Rogan, was under his direction splendidly played by a band of military trumpeters and drummers. The effect was electrical, and gave just the military touch which the occasion demanded. It was surely a day to be remembered, and one left the Cathedral with loyal and reverent emotions deeply stirred.

MR. GRANVILLE BANTOCK'S 'ATALANTA IN CALYDON.'

By Ernest Newman.

Mr. Granville Bantock's latest work, 'Atalanta in Calydon,' was produced at a Manchester Hallé Concert on January 25. It is a setting for unaccompanied voices of four of the odes from Swinburne's drama of the same title. The composer himself styles his work a choral symphony. 'Choral ode' would perhaps be a better name for it, for though it is in four movements that roughly correspond to the four movements of the ordinary symphony, there is nothing specifically symphonic in the structure. Mr. Bantock is said to hold somewhat pessimistic ideas as to the future of orchestral music in England; the fewness of our good orchestras, the fact that hardly any concerts pay their way, and the general apathy of the public make the outlook, indeed, none too promising, though perhaps Mr. Bantock sees through a glass a trifle too darkly. His present enthusiasm for choral music is at any rate causing a notable expansion of his style and a great enrichment of our repertory. The Northern Competition Festivals have shown him what unaccompanied choral singing can be, and he is now subtilising his texture and effects to an extent that in its turn stimulates the choirs to still further developments of technique. In 'Atalanta' he has certainly set English choirs the stiffest task they have ever had given to them. The work is nominally in twenty parts—not 'parts' in the old contrapuntal sense, but rather corresponding to orchestral groups; and as the composer stipulates for not less than ten voices to a part, it is clear that only large choirs can perform the work. While a skilful contrapuntist, Mr. Bantock's aim in choral writing has always been predominantly a poetic one,—to enrich the moods of great poetry with the more insistent appeal and warmer colour that music can lend them. Counterpoint for its own sake can find only limited employment in a scheme of this kind; the main factors are bound to be melody and harmony—a melody closely modelled upon the contour of the poetic idea, and a harmony full of surprises, clashes, inter-suffusions, poignancies. One is sometimes inclined to think that the old distinctions between styles, founded on the qualities—or supposed qualities—of instruments, have no longer their old validity, and that we are on the way to a kind of generalised style to which all instruments must conform as well as they can. It is a new style, set primarily by the orchestra, which after all is merely a single musical instrument, and the only one that can be said to approach perfection. It not only allows of full and rich expression but prompts it; and it is inevitable that a generation to which the orchestra is the natural mother tongue of music should do most even of its non-orchestral thinking in terms of this. Mr. Bantock's present choral writing is largely orchestral in conception—which does not for a moment imply, let us hasten to add, that it is in the least unvocal. It is enough if the vision and recollection of the orchestra kindle the imagination to a new scale and intensity of emotion; the actual expression can then be achieved in terms of the instruments at our service. What Mr. Bantock has done in 'Atalanta in Calydon,' is not to write orchestral music for voices, but to use voices, in a legitimate way, to interest and move us as deeply as an orchestra could do.

One lays stress upon this point because it is easy to misconceive his purpose in laying out his choral masses, as the analysts have told us, on quasi-orchestral lines. He divides the choir into three main groups—(a) male and female voices in six parts, (b) a male choir and a female choir each in four parts, (c) a male choir and a female choir each in three parts; that is, five choral bodies in all. (a) is at once the largest and the most complete in itself, and plays much the same part in the score of 'Atalanta' as the string group does in an orchestra. The different strata of (c) may be supposed to correspond to the wood-wind group, and those of (b)—where the voices are more numerous than in (c)—to the horns and brass. But though perhaps only a very foolish person would say that Mr. Bantock has tried to make the various voices do the work of strings, oboes, clarinets, trombones, and so on, it may not be superfluous to insist that he has done nothing of the kind. What he has done is to use groups and sub-sections of different weights and colours to get something of the varied play of tint and perspective that we have in the orchestra,—and of course to combine them all for the more massive effects. It is not merely that he contrasts the groups bodily in different movements,—the second and fourth being for the full choir, the first for male voices alone, and the third for female voices alone,—but that within the movement itself he aims at enforcing the poetic idea by a quasi-orchestral blending or contrast or antiphony of colour. And who can say that this does the slightest violence to the function of voices as voices?

The movement that pleased the audience most at the first performance was apparently that for female voices alone,—partly, no doubt, because it is simpler in texture and more obvious in idea, partly because the ladies succeeded in maintaining better intonation than the men sometimes did. The three other movements, however, are incomparably greater. They have the qualities that make the choruses of 'Omar Khàyyam' so striking: a fine poetic sense, the art of making music the vehicle of human experience and reflection, the command of a wide range of emotion and of all kinds of expression,—the lyrical, the rhetorical, the dramatic, the philosophical. Here and there one may hold that the composer has been led away from the deeper sense of the poetry by the desire to treat certain passing images or figures in pictorial fashion. Perhaps this may be one of the exigencies of the choral writer on such a scale as this; he may feel that it is necessary in order to ensure the needful variety. It was some such idea as this, apparently, that induced Mr. Bantock to make a 'picture' of the chorus:

> 'We are no other than a moving row
> Of magic shadow-shapes that come and go'

in 'Omar Khàyyam,' where some of us feel that the outer rather than the inner aspect of the words has been dwelt upon. So in 'Atalanta in Calydon' now and then; it is doubtful, for example, whether it was the right thing to give two contrasted kinds of expression to the images of the line, 'And wrought with weeping and laughter.' But after all these are almost microscopic flies in a mass of first-rate ointment, and cannot affect our admiration for the variety and poignancy of expression that Mr. Bantock has put into the music. It is no small achievement to have brought music up to the philosophic level of Swinburne's great lines and sustained it there so long.

The Hallé Choir did well on the whole in the first performance of the work, but lapses of intonation obscured the musical logic of several passages, and the phrasing was throughout not sufficiently elastic—not near enough, that is, to the unfettered, bar-less rhythm that should be the ideal of poetic singing and playing.

LONDON OPERA-HOUSE.

By Hermann Klein.

When the doors of this Opera-House close on March 2, it will not be on the final as well as the introductory chapter of Mr. Hammerstein's great experiment. The die has been otherwise cast. Subscribers have been forthcoming to the necessary tune, and their promises have emboldened the American impresario—who has candidly admitted that he is neither a multi-millionaire nor a philanthropist—to announce a three months' summer season beginning the third week in April. This will not be at the lower range of prices; but in spite (and also in consequence) of that fact, it is going to be a financial success, and will therefore be followed in October by another long winter season at the rates which have wound up the current season. By that time the undertaking will probably be established on a solid basis. Happily there is to be an alteration in the kind of opera to which the scheme has so far been restricted. The presence of two distinguished librettists among the leading subscribers will necessarily make a difference. We shall be having for certain Lord Howard de Walden and Mr. Josef Holbrooke's 'The Children of Don,' and probably also the Duke of Argyll and the late Learmont Drysdale's 'Fionn and Tera,' both of which new operas will be presented through the medium of the English language. There is likewise talk of certain Wagner operas being sung in the vernacular. This will be good news, provided the necessary steps be taken to secure a distinct and refined enunciation of the English text. Diction such as the whole house can hear and understand is essentially the crux of the important question whether the love of English Opera (or opera sung in English) is ever to take permanent root in this country.

Meanwhile, as it seems to me, the enterprises of the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, and the London Opera-

House can proceed, each upon its own separate lines, without hurting one another, but with inestimable stimulus and benefit to the growth of the national idea —that is, to the cultivation and development of a form of lyric art wherein our native tongue and native performers have too long been relegated to an inferior place.

'LOUISE.'

A fortnight before Mr. Hammerstein lowered his prices—to be precise, on January 24—he added to his repertory a splendid example of modern French music-drama in the shape of Charpentier's 'Louise.' At that time we were naturally comparing his productions point for point with the best that Covent Garden can do. So long as grand opera and summer season prices are charged, it is only fair that the standard of criticism shall be elevated to the 'top notch.' When they are cut down one-half, to ordinary theatre level, it is equally fair to somewhat lower the standard and avoid comparisons altogether. I doubt, however, whether Mr. Hammerstein would thank his critics for doing either, his ambition being to maintain his representations at the highest possible level, even though compelled by circumstances to bid for full houses through an appeal to a wider and less wealthy public. Enough, for the moment, that this appeal proved eminently successful. It was immediately responded to by a series of crowded audiences, who displayed an intelligent and intense appreciation of the high-class operatic fare placed before them.

One complaint, and one only, could be urged against the performance of 'Louise,' and that was a sin of omission. Charpentier's opera is beautiful, but long. Unless it was to last from eight o'clock till midnight something had to be cut; hence the elimination (at the earlier representations) of the extremely characteristic music allotted to the Noctambule and other Parisian 'types' when the curtain rises on the second Act. But this music should never be entirely left out. A portion is quite essential to the completeness of the musical scheme, whereas some of the concerted numbers can be shortened without detriment to the general effect. It is wonderful how 'Louise' grows upon the listener with closer acquaintance. Each fresh hearing reveals new beauties, new subtleties of thought and expression, new master-touches of thematic development and ingenious treatment. Yet somehow the book is not wholly satisfying: the dénouement leaves one with a sense of discontent, of problems raised but left unsolved. In some respects 'Louise' is not less of a masterpiece than 'Faust' or 'Carmen,' but it will never be so enduringly popular as either.

In an executive and also in a scenic sense—judging, let us say, from the superior plane of the Opéra-Comique, where the work was first produced in February, 1900,—there was really very little fault to find with this performance of 'Louise.' The principal parts were well acted and something more than adequately sung; the long array of minor rôles gave opportunity for distinction to the numerous contingent of clever and intelligent people who form the second rank of Mr. Hammerstein's personnel. Mlle. Vallandri, a Frenchwoman, realised the purely Parisian aspect of Louise's restless, unsatisfied temperament more truthfully than anyone else I have seen in the part, whilst doing easy justice to her music. Mlle. Marguerite d'Alvarez scored quite a hit as the Mother, and M. Francis Combe, if not equal to poor Gilibert, made a salient, sympathetic figure of the Father. The Julien of M. Jean Auber was a painstaking effort, but the Montmartre poet requires a more vivacious touch: he is a lively Bohemian, not a plodding 'literary gent.' The orchestra, under M. Luigi Cherubini, treated us to some of the best playing that has yet been heard at this opera-house, and gave an admirably refined performance of Charpentier's difficult score. The mise en scène, too, was first-rate.

'LA TRAVIATA'—'FAUST.'

That hackneyed operas can derive renewed interest from a good ensemble and a picturesque setting was made agreeably manifest by the performances of 'La Traviata' on the 2nd and 'Faust' on February 9. In the former, wisdom was shown in the matter of costumes by choosing the period of Louis XVI. It is a noteworthy fact that operatic choruses (and even some operatic 'stars') know better how to wear the the elaborate attire of the 18th century than the plainer dress of the mid-19th. Mr. Hammerstein experimented with the latter when Madame Melba sang 'Violetta' during his first New York season. The diva, of course, made a pretty picture, but the rest looked like so many fish out of water. On the occasion under notice Mlle. Victoria Fer—who, by the way, avoided the anachronism of wearing an up-to-date gown—considerably enhanced her reputation by a dramatically powerful and vocally admirable impersonation of the Dame aux Camélias. She imparted a surprising amount of sincerity and realism to those touching incidents of the Dumas drama which time has robbed of most of their original impressiveness. With Mr. Orville Harrold as a robust-voiced Alfredo, and M. Vilmos Beck as a dignified Germont père, the cast lacked neither merit nor efficiency.

Miss Félice Lyne's first appearance as Marguerite, combined with the lure of cheap prices, drew a packed house for 'Faust,' the audience being by far the largest since the opening night of the season. The youthful American was here attempting a heavier task than she had previously essayed, and to those who expected a Marguerite equal in all respects to her Gilda the result must have been disappointing. Girlish grace and charm, unaffected sweetness of expression, were undeniably present in her embodiment, while the lighter music of the Garden scene was sung with faultlessly neat technique. But in the more dramatic passages of the opera the young artist was obviously overweighted. She made a pathetic little figure, and did everything with intelligence and a welcome absence of strain; but in the bird-like tones there was no note of passion, no resonant utterance to touch the heart or give adequate effect to the situation. A girl Marguerite may be a delightful change for one act of Gounod's opera, but for her to fill the whole picture is a physical impossibility. Anyhow, Miss Lyne is a singer of such unusual talent and promise that, while offering her every encouragement to work on ambitious lines, I would advise her to eschew parts that are still too heavy for her, and seek to cultivate greater variety and depth of tone-colour, with yet greater brilliancy and mastery of vocal art in her legitimate domain of a pure light soprano.

'THE BARBER OF SEVILLE.'

The soundness of this view received abundant illustration in the comparative triumph that Miss Lyne achieved on February 17 with her fifth rôle, namely, Rosina in 'The Barber of Seville.' Her brilliant delivery of the Rossinian roulades, and especially of a remarkably difficult cadenza with flute obbligato in the 'Shadow song' from 'Dinorah' (sung in the Lesson Scene), were justly acclaimed with enthusiasm by a huge audience. One could see that comedy is not her natural bent; at least, she has not so far had the training favourable to a development of the vis comica. This may come later by dint of study and observation; for where there is so much alertness and intelligence as Miss Lyne showed in this first attempt, there is surely the talent for acting as well as singing to perfection all these lighter parts of the familiar répertoire. The general performance of Rossini's masterpiece was chiefly noteworthy for an exceptional degree of boisterousness and bustle on the part of all the men. It is opera buffa, I know, and here it is very hard to draw the line. But after all, the Conte Almaviva is an Italian gentleman, even when he plays the tipsy soldier, and M. Georges Régis, if he sang creditably, was sadly lacking in distinction. M. Figarella (Figaro), M. de Grazia (Don Bartolo), and M. Enzo Bozzano (Don Basilio) were fairly amusing in their exaggerations of the traditional 'business.'

DR. ETHEL SMYTH.

The following extracts, translated from an article by Richard Specht on Dr. Ethel Smyth, that appeared in Der Merker (Vienna) for December, 1911, will be read with interest in connection with the sketch of the composer's life given in our last issue:

Generally speaking, the remark Mulier taceat in musica holds good, in spite of the many ladies who are occupied with musical needlework, sewing melodies, and knitting tones; in spite of the heroic musical pose of Ingeborg von Bronsart, the well-bred pedantry of Matilde von Kraklik, the excellent, even surprisingly clever Brahms imitations of Kitty von Ischerich, the bon-bon-box elegance of Chaminade. All this is imitation work 'after good masters.' None of these ladies compose from the inner necessity of a creative impulse, but from emotion or vanity, innocence or musical insanity; and the worst of it is they hinder the career of really creative women by begetting distrust and prejudice against female composers.

But there is one, an Englishwoman, who has swept away, I had almost said, battered down, such prejudices. Looking neither to the right nor to the left, going her own way in cheerful energy over every difficulty, thin, energetic, extremely alive, hair slightly grey, gifted with enormous will power, full of an inward gaiety that perhaps has cost her much to win, this woman has proved that her sex does not exclude true musical invention; for her music has a strong absolutely individual tone, without pedigree, and according to no known pattern.

Her name is Ethel Smyth, parentage a family of land-owners who much objected to her rejecting the customary husband-hunt for artistic life.

It makes me laugh to-day when I think of how I made her acquaintance. In the house of Bruno Walter, that white flame of an artist soul, that unselfish and tireless champion of real talent, I saw lying on the pianoforte an opera score, opened it, and my attention was instantly fettered by an extraordinary chorus. I asked Walter what the work was. He spoke with enthusiasm of the stern energy of this new and very singular talent, astonished that so strong a creative gift should be a woman's, and added that a remark made about her years ago by Hermann Levi, that she was the most musical individual he had ever come across, except Wagner, had recently been repeated to him; at the same time he told me that the composer was in Vienna, and that he much hoped Mahler would produce the work. I then wrote to her and begged her to send me a copy rather than bring one, wishing to be uninfluenced in my judgment by the possible charms of the composer. She at once sent the opera, with a few pleasant words which showed me that she was unaccustomed to over-great interest being taken in her work. But one day, before I had had time to examine the score, the door-bell rang, and ere my servant—visibly astonished at the appearance of the visitor—could prevent it, in came a woman, hair rather untidy, hat of no known form, a jacket and mantle upon which wind and storm had done its worst, the colour being no longer recognisable. A firm hand grasps mine, and with a rather mischievous smile that lends a gentle and comradely expression to a face that is not at all 'pretty,' that life has somewhat sternly modelled, she said: 'You see, after all, I have come myself,' and then she begins to talk, very cleverly, with incredible vitality and impulsiveness, thanks me for my interest in her work, raves about Mahler, as also of the work of Prince Edmond de Polignac, whom she considers one of the great musicians, and so on and so on. And then she began playing her opera to me.

It is about this opera, 'The Wreckers,' that I want to talk to-day, partly because I believe it is her chief work, partly because it is the one I know best. Once you know it, this 'Wreckers,' which owing to its stern, heartbreaking quality, may at first disturb and distress some people, will not let one go. In this great dramatic ballad is a note of defiant, despairing passion, a merciless power that even while repelling you is irresistible. A dark Cornish legend which Ethel Smyth had picked up from the fisher-folk on that coast, was woven by her and her friend Henry Brewster, the actual poet, into a strong sinister story.

The strange thing about the music to this wild legend is the absence of conventional feminality, of any trace of sentimentality, or of revelling in soft emotion and trivial expansiveness. The style is curt, as if hammered in red-hot iron; from first to last, highest musical tension, near snapping-point. The crowd, treated as one heroic individual, is an inspiration of genius; their wild prayers for a storm, the victims of which are, as it were, sacrifices acceptable unto God—their frenzy when the treachery is discovered! All this is drawn with a manifold strength that cannot come to full effect, it is true, unless the chorus is admirably trained to dramatic representation, but as creation it has unexampled force. Most beautifully are certain sad melodies, notably a Cornish one, interwoven in the music; splendid, moving, inexplicable from the point of view of reason and therefore doubly overwhelming is the 'Song of the Rat,' a sort of agonized parody of a music-hall tune, wrung from the passionate rage of the forsaken maiden, wrought with harmonies, as of a spirit writhing in the throes of poison, that torture and haunt the ear. But in things harmonic Ethel Smyth is of masterly boldness. The strangest sequences, the most ruthless modulations become under her pen logical necessities, because the natural expression of an inner necessity. And this not to speak of her contrapuntal art: organ-points, the cantus firmus, inversions, double counterpoint are secondary matters with her, for she handles them with such ease that their presence is only discovered after careful examination; the chorus in the third act and the song of Avis are good examples of this. The prelude of the second act is unequalled as a picture of mood in music: strange, unearthly sounds, almost abstractions, mixed with the ghostlike voice of the sea and the spirit of legends—a test indeed of giftedness. One may perhaps question her motive in sometimes taking fragmentary portions of her themes, telescoping and blending these into a whole and using them as basis of her accompaniments; an instance is to be found at the culminating point of the work in that flaming outbreak, the love duet of the second act. The use of melodrama in 'The Wreckers' is extremely interesting and often in the highest degree effective; notably the passage in which Thirza, Pascoe's wife, bursts into a terrible parody of the prayer which the wreckers are singing, accompanied by the organ, in the chapel hard by:

> Ye, whose eyes are full of salt,
> Whose mouth is full of sand,
> Keep silence for ever!
> Spare neither women nor children,
> Slaughter them like beasts of the field! . . .
> God of those that suffer,
> Grant us our prey to-night!
> Hallelujah! Amen!

The boldness of the above effect must be seen upon the stage itself and cannot well be imagined from print, but so it is with any moment of exceeding passion, whether of pain, ecstasy, of horror; a description cannot do more than indicate.

If there be anything womanly about 'The Wreckers' may be it is that the tension is perhaps over-great. It is true one cannot adequately judge from the pianoforte score; one must see the work in production, or perhaps, which does as well, hear it rendered by the composer herself. This thin, resolute woman whom the spirit of convention has never touched, who laughs at the world and all its follies, who is happier in her rough tweed dress and her indescribable cap than in the smart clothes of the drawing-room lioness—which she can be any moment if she chooses—who has lived her life alone in the country with a big dog in a lonely cottage till she herself has become a piece of English nature, who has stridden bravely through wind and weather and learned to look the sun in the face; this woman, behind whose devil-may-care cheeriness it is easy to read sorrow and the stress of the fight, renders her creations with an overwhelming strength, a fire of conviction, an incomparable earnestness, a storm, in short, of passion and power which beggars description. He who has seen her at the pianoforte will never forget it. . . .

I seem to hear someone object: 'You tell us, then, that the chief worth and ethic content of her work is its unwomanliness?'

This conclusion is too silly to refute, a mere play upon words; and of a woman whose mighty chorus, 'Hey, Nonny No,' is winning for her the hearts of those who strive and suffer; who has turned aside from all things in life that are supposed to spell happiness for a woman, yet whose work never gives the lie to womanly emotion; whose existence is for her art alone—of such a woman it behoves us to speak seriously. Those who choose their path, and persist in it with or without encouragement, are either freaks or very real people; such as know her work will have little difficulty in deciding to which category Ethel Smyth belongs.

Church and Organ Music.

The Royal College of Organists cannot be accused of narrowness of view, and the series of lectures recently given under its auspices must have been of the highest value to those present. The subjects were 'The teaching of pianoforte-playing,' by Oscar Beringer; 'The teaching of organ-playing,' by Sir Walter Parratt; 'The relationship of the organist to the musical developments of the present day,' by Dr. G. F. Huntley; 'Rheinberger's Organ sonatas,' by Dr. G. J. Bennett; 'Vowels and consonants: a study in phonetics,' by Dr. T. Keighley; and 'Organ-touch and phrasing,' by Dr. H. A. Harding. It has been said by someone that organists are broken-down pianists; but it may be rejoined that the good organist must necessarily possess at least a good pianoforte technique. The two lectures on pianoforte-playing seem to have crystallized the method of teaching which has made Mr. Beringer famous. An unusually fine opportunity was certainly offered by the lecturer to those wishing to know the latest principles of the art. Sir Walter Parratt holds a unique position as an organ teacher, and we have not yet recovered from our amazement that the College was not crowded out on the occasion when he gave away his secrets. His remarks on his subject were admirably pointed from time to time by references and illustrations showing the wide scholarship of the man, and offering an example of untold value.

Dr. Huntley chose a very important theme for his discourse, and his excellent development is worthy the attention of all who recognise the importance of cultivating other attributes of the organist's art besides mere organ-playing. In excellent language he insisted on the necessity of artistic accompaniment, extemporisation, choice of voluntaries, recital pieces, and the many branches which make up the organist's daily work.

The opportunity of hearing a lecture on Rheinberger's Organ sonatas by one of his pupils is rare enough, and it is sufficient to say that Dr. Bennett, the accomplished organist of Lincoln Cathedral, was conspicuously happy in all he said, and in his illustrations, which were admirably chosen.

Dr. Keighley's subject is one of great importance. Surely refined and facile diction are necessary to every organist, in view of the position he is able to command to-day! The lecture must have been achieved at the expense of considerable time and thought, but as a result we have a concise and lucid explanation of the matter.

Dr. Harding's lecture is a synopsis of his many years' experience as a teacher, and we are in hearty agreement with all he says. His remarks on phrasing are admirable, and his exposure of the absurdities to be found in much printed organ music only too necessary.

When we add that these lectures may be obtained by purchasing the calendar of the R.C.O. (price 10s.), we do so in the hope that many will avail themselves of so much valuable matter.

In the University Music Class-room at Edinburgh, the fourth of a series of historical concerts was given on February 7. The subject chosen was 'Organ music illustrative of the old and new styles,' and with Mr. Lemare as the organist, it need hardly be said that the recital gave delight to all present. The organ (built in 1857, and to some extent modernised in 1907 by Messrs. W. Hill & Son) is a comprehensive instrument, though the Solo organ strangely enough does not, from the specification sent us, appear to possess a Tuba. The programme comprised works by J. S. Bach, Mendelssohn, Rheinberger, Guilmant, Widor, Lemare and Dvorák, and in such capable hands served well to illustrate the many styles embraced by organ music.

The programme-paper included an interesting series of notes on organ-building and organ-playing, but the concluding paragraph may be open to question: 'The modern organist and composer for the organ is differentiated from his predecessors by an ideal quite his own. Liszt tried to make an orchestra of the pianoforte, the modern organist wants to do the same with the organ. The ambition is not only legitimate, but even praiseworthy.'

But did Liszt really do this? We admit that he invented much in the way of pianoforte figure and independent treatment, but the music to which we presume the above paragraph points was at least written for the instrument. It is in trying, by means of orchestral transcriptions, to imitate the orchestra, that we believe so much harm is done. But we grant that to endeavour, by using the enormous possibilities of the modern organ in new compositions for the instrument, to 'emulate' the orchestra in its tone variety can have but a good result. There are unfortunately too few writers who seem to realise the dignity of the organ, and it is too evident that the modern organ effects are liable to be misused. The writer quite properly adds: 'But there are limits to the powers of the organ as to all things. If the modern organist transgresses these limits, he will denaturalise his wonderful instrument, and do a dis-service to his art.' Every word of this is true, and our only difficulty is to reconcile the two quotations. Possibly the first was not quite properly expressed.

The first of an admirable series of six special organ recitals and lectures on musical subjects was given recently at the Battersea Polytechnic. The works in the programme were arranged for organ and orchestra, and included the 'Solemn Melody' by Walford Davies, Handel's Concerto in B flat, and 'Two Bourrées' and Mendelssohn's 'Cornelius' March. Dr. Richards, organist of Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, was the organist on this occasion, and the Polytechnic Orchestra was conducted by Dr. Wetton, head of the Music Department.

It may interest our musical readers to learn that a comprehensive book of music has been prepared for the next annual Festival of the Nonconformist Choir Union, which will again be held at the Crystal Palace. The book includes such items as Gounod's motet, 'Gallia,' an anthem by John E. West, 'Song of Joy,' Barnby's sacred part-song, 'The Haven,' and other sacred items, as well as part-songs by Elgar, 'As torrents in summer,' Elliott's 'Speak to me with thine eyes,' and two short folk-songs by Brahms, 'In silent night' and 'Love, fare thee well.'

This popular organization, which has been in existence for nearly a quarter of a century, is a voluntary one, and exists solely for the purpose of improving the quality of Free Church singing. The syllabus for the 1912 Festival is now ready, and can be obtained from the secretary, Mr. Arthur Berridge, 24, Wallingford Avenue, St. Quintin Park, W.

On Sunday, February 4, Mendelssohn's 'Lauda Sion' was given by the choir at the Halifax Place Chapel, Nottingham. The soloists were Miss Emmie Warner, Madame Ethel Parkin, Mr. J. Franklin Pearson, and Mr. Joseph Asher. Mr. E. M. Barber conducted, and Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson was at the organ.

The accounts relating to the complimentary dinner given to the Directors of Messrs. Novello & Co. last December have now been closed. The balance in hand has been presented by the committee to the Novello employees' Provident Fund, which is managed entirely by the employees.

Reviews.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Scherzo in G minor (from the Octett, Op. 20). Composed by Mendelssohn. Arranged for the pianoforte by Viggo Kihl.

Valse in A minor. Aubade. Cortège galant. Composed by Theo. Wendt (Op. 24).

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

It is well-known that Mendelssohn made an orchestral version of the Scherzo from his Octett for use with his first Symphony, and that the score became the property of the Philharmonic Society. This now receives the justice of publication, in the form of a pianoforte version by Mr. Viggo Kihl. The pianist's instinct shows itself in every bar of the arrangement, which is a skilful adaptation of difficult material.

Mr. Theo. Wendt's style as a composer for the pianoforte is one that gives artistic elaboration, refined and careful in workmanship, to ideas couched in a familiar idiom. In sentiment these pieces belong to the category of drawing-room music, which they adorn. They are closely akin to dance music; the first is a quick waltz with a mid-European tendency to sudden variations of tempo; the second is stately and 'à la Menuet'; the third is a slow and much-disguised mazurka.

Richard Wagner. Sämtliche Schriften und Dichtungen. Volks-Ausgabe. Sechste Auflage.

[Breitkopf & Härtel.]

The most impecunious student of Wagner need no longer be without a set of his prose and poetical works. Messrs. Breitkopf & Härtel, having completed the fifth edition with the two supplementary volumes (making twelve in all) that were reviewed in our February issue, are now bringing out a sixth ('Popular Edition') in twenty-four parts at sixpence each. The first two of these lie before us. They comprise together nearly three hundred pages, and contain, besides the general preface that Wagner wrote for the issue of 1883, the earliest writings, such as the autobiographical sketch, the account of 'Das Liebesverbot,' 'A Pilgrimage to Beethoven,' 'An End in Paris,' a number of other articles that Wagner wrote from Paris, and the texts of 'Rienzi' and the 'Flying Dutchman'—the contents, in fact, of vol. i. of the older ten-volume editions. We may regret that the publishers have preserved the Gothic type that is so trying to non-German eyes; but the cutting is clear, and the paper, in spite of its thinness, opaque and white. We presume it is intended to make this 'Popular' edition as complete as the fifth, by including in it the new matter printed there. If so, it will be an exceedingly cheap twelve-shillingsworth.

Five songs, Op. 47. Seven songs, Op. 48. By Brahms. English versions by W. G. Rothery.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Every English edition of Brahms's songs is a thing to be grateful for. In the present case Mr. Rothery's smooth versification and attention to phrasing and syllabic accentuation add to the value of the collection. The songs of Opp. 47 and 48 are not much in vogue, for on the whole they appeal by their subtle simplicity and the refined beauty of their accompaniments rather than by striking ideas. They would well repay the attention of English singers anxious to extend their repertory with art-songs that are interesting and neither familiar nor exacting. Op. 47 consists of 'The message' ('Botschaft'), 'Consuming love' ('Liebesgluth'), 'Sunday' ('Sonntag'), 'Red roses of summer' ('O liebliche Wangen'), and 'The love-letter' ('Die Liebende schreibt'). Op. 48 consists of 'The watchful lover' ('Der Gang zum Liebchen'), 'The false love' ('Der Ueberläufer'), 'A maid's despair' ('Liebesklage des Mädchens'), 'Love betrayed for riches' ('Gold überwiegt die Liebe'), 'Comfort in tears' ('Trost in Thränen'), 'No joyous morrow breaks for me' ('Vergangen ist mir Glück und Heil'), 'When wint'ry winds their dirge are singing' ('Herbstgefühl'). The last-named is a particularly beautiful example. It should be added that the original German text is provided as well as the new English version.

The Badness of Wagner's Bad Luck. A first exposure of Anti-Wagnerian journalism. By David Irvine.

[Watts & Co.]

This pamphlet of 128 pp. is a fairly lively polemic against all and sundry critics with whom the writer does not agree. Mr. Irvine shows a tendency to tear his passion to tatters, and makes us feel that his so-called exposure is part of the badness of Wagner's bad luck. He regards the slanders (that is, opinions of Wagner not shared by Mr. Irvine) as 'a symptom the cause of which lies in a morally corrupt Protestantism'!

In the Moonlight. Waltz for Pianoforte. By M. de Jong.

[Francis, Day & Hunter.]

This well-written and attractive composition is by the director of the excellent little band that helps the digestion of visitors to Lyons's 'Popular' Café. In this connection one is reminded of Sousa's theory as to why bands play at the officers' mess: 'The nearer the (trom)-bone the sweeter the meat.' Waltzes are apt to be very much alike, some of them more so than others, but Mr. de Jong has contrived to compose melodies that are not reminiscent, although one remembers them.

'THE ORIGIN OF THE IRISH HARP.'

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—The Rev. F. W. Galpin, in his interesting lecture on 'The origin of the Clarsech or Irish harp,' printed in your February issue, attributed to Edward Bunting statements which were really made by Samuel Ferguson. Strangely enough, Engel and Hipkins have both made the same mistake. But a glance at Bunting's 'Ancient music of Ireland' (Dublin, 1840) ought to be sufficient to show that chapter iii., which treats 'Of the antiquity of the harp and bagpipe in Ireland,' was contributed by his friend Ferguson. And it is in this chapter that the musical instrument on the Ullard Cross is figured and described.

Mr. Galpin seemed disposed to pour a little gentle ridicule on the supposed relations between Egypt and Ireland; but after all, what does Ferguson say? 'It is the first specimen of a harp without a fore-pillar that has hitherto been discovered out of Egypt' (p. 48). And 'there can be no question of the fact that at a very early period a strong tide of civilization flowed into the east of Europe from the Nile, and thence spread northward and westward' (p. 50). Surely these are not very extravagant statements. At the time of writing, the Assyrian monuments had not been discovered, and the famous Greek vase in the Munich Museum was unknown. Mr. Galpin himself admitted that the earliest Irish harps wanted the fore-pillar. Is it possible to name anything that did not arise in the East? As Sydney Smith wittily put it, 'The further I go West, the more convinced I am that the wise men came from the East.'

Rather less than twenty years ago, I myself paid a visit to the great cross at Ullard; and I am bound to say that, in my opinion, the figure in Bunting's book, which lies open before me as I write, errs, not in indicating too little but rather in indicating too much, Six strings are clearly depicted; although Ferguson says, 'it is difficult to determine whether the number of strings represented is six or seven.' With this statement I agree; except that for 'difficult' I would substitute 'impossible.' I was also unable to discover the slightest trace of a fore-pillar; and, exposed as the cross is to the humidity of an Irish climate, I cannot suppose that the lapse of nearly twenty years has made it easier to trace the outlines of the sculpture.

The sketch of the Ullard instrument exhibited by Mr. Galpin fairly staggered me. He told us that he had taken 'photographs and rubbings'; but when he added, 'and this is the result,' I was irresistibly reminded of Aaron's words: 'I cast it into the fire, and there came out this calf.' If Mr. Galpin's figure bears any resemblance to the remains of that which was carved eleven centuries ago upon the cross of Ullard, I will admit that I have completely forgotten what the latter is like.

Names matter little, except for purposes of reference. A stringed instrument, held upon the knee of one whose arm is outstretched across it, seems to me to be some kind of harp. Mr. Galpin's theory of the late introduction of the harp into Ireland is very ingenious, but is it more than a theory? Ferguson, by the way, is very cautious and undogmatic in advancing his own theory: he merely writes of what he calls 'the startling presumption that the Irish have had their harp originally out of Egypt.' And one may still think that the Ullard instrument wanted the fore-pillar, without believing that it came directly from the land of the Pharaohs.—Yours faithfully,

ARTHUR T. FROGGATT.

3, Stade Street, Hythe.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—I have read with much interest the article under the above heading in your February issue, from the cultured pen of the Rev. F. W. Galpin, but I cannot at all agree with his conclusions, some of which are based on erroneous premises.

Great stress is laid by Mr. Galpin on the Ullard Harp of the 9th century, and he traverses Bunting's and Petrie's theory that it was a harp without a fore-pillar. He visited Ullard in June, 1909, and says that he 'settled the doubtful points,' definitely giving it as his opinion that the instrument sculptured at Ullard was really 'a large quadrangular crot, with the usual fore-pillar or support.' (The italicised word is Mr. Galpin's.)

Now, as a matter of fact, the Ullard Harp is undoubtedly a harp without the fore-pillar, and this is evident from an examination. I have gone to some little trouble in the matter, and I am happy to corroborate the opinion of Sir Samuel Ferguson, Dr. Petrie, and Bunting. Mr. P. O'Leary (who was cicerone for Mr. Galpin on his visit to Ullard) tells me that I may make use of his name as to the fact that 'there is no trace of a fore-pillar' on the Ullard Harp, nor yet on the Duiske Harp, dating from the same period, and evidently carved by the same sculptor. As an esteemed member of the Royal Society of Antiquaries of Ireland, Mr. O'Leary stands as an authority on all concerning Duiske or Ullard, and he has known both harps for over forty years. (By the way, the Duiske Harp has seven strings, not six, but is identical in many other respects with that of Ullard.) Mr. Galpin evidently mistook the inner bead that runs round the panel for the front pillar; and the day he visited Ullard was not very propitious.

Again, the instrument carved on the Durrow High Cross is a genuine harp—not a crot or cruit—in fact it is almost a replica of the Nigg Harp, as in fig. 3 of Mr. Galpin's paper.

Ardmore was not 'a Danish-Christian community closely connected with England,' and the harp in the arcading of Ardmore Cathedral is Irish work.

Experts have pronounced the shrine of St. Moedhoc to be of the late 9th century. c. 880; even Mr. Coffey hesitates to give it, as some have thought, 'not earlier than the 11th century.'

Finally, let me add in regard to Caedmon, in whose 10th century 'Metrical Paraphrase' a harp appears, it is admitted that he was of 'Celtic descent and training' (Cambridge Hist. of Eng. Lit.).—Yours faithfully,

W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

February 7, 1912.

In reply to 'J. H.' as to Lord Crofton, composer of the hymn-tune 'Crofton,' Dr. Grattan Flood sends us the following information :—

'Baron Crofton (Edward Henry Churchill Crofton), third holder of the title, was born October 21, 1834, and succeeded his father, December 27, 1869. He is a keen musician, and is one of the vice-presidents of the Irish Folk-song Society (London). He composed his well-known hymn-tune "Crofton" in 1884, not long after the hymn was written by Miss Dorothea Frances Blomfield—now Mrs. Gurney. This is still the popular hymn "O perfect love," and was written in 1883 for the marriage of Mrs. Gurney's sister. The tune was published in the revised edition of the Irish "Church Hymnal" in 1893, as No. 596, and is there named "Crofton." In the same volume appears another tune by Lord Crofton entitled "Roscommon," set to the words "Stand up, stand up for Jesus," words by Rev. G. Duffield, D.D. (written in 1854), who died July 6, 1888.'

THE TEACHING OF COMPOSITION.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

Sir,—Your article on this subject seems to call for some comment from me, not because my name is mentioned, but because your writer (whose name I should gladly have seen appended to his essay) appears to have gone astray on one very important point. He says that both the methods of teaching which he correctly summarises must 'minimise the value of the personal equation in any student'—in fact, that all imitation on the part of a student must tend to make him a mere parrot. Waiving for the moment the inquiry which rises to one's lips as to what method of instruction your critic would deem preferable to those he regards with distrust, I must proceed to risk offending my numerous past and present pupils by emphatically declaring that all pupils at first are parrots and nothing else. Was your critic not a parrot too, when in his mother's arms he was taught to say 'da-da' and distinguish it from 'ta-ta'? Has your critic ever seen the first attempt of a composition student? Apart from mere crudeness of technique it is always so banal and aimless as to reduce its poor creator to despair. Indeed, indeed, originality does not proceed from within, but from without. Can you tell me of any composer, except a very bad one (curious paradox!), who developed an immediate individuality? Every composer worth sixpence has begun by being a feeble and pale reflection of his contemporaries. Is there a glimpse of Beethoven in even his first six published works? Is there a glimpse of Wagner in his first three operas? Is not early Chopin just Hummel and water, or early Grieg very bad Schumann? Apart from the fatal critical comparison of every new young man's new work with the works of the supreme masters, I do not think that people ever look upon him with the light of common-sense. 'Why, in heaven's name,' groans the conductor, 'can't these young fools write playable passages for the orchestra?' Does he think the composer is clumsy on purpose? The results of his lack of skill are far more agonising to him than to anyone else. The cause is that he knows he will not be listened to unless he goes one better than Strauss, and so, alas! he tries. 'Why,' demands an exasperated public, 'can't he give us a tune?' Simply because he knows that if he did he would be laughed at. I only know one young man who has had the courage to imitate Sullivan and German, and though he promises to eclipse both he is having a sad time of it at present. The average young composer of to-day tries hard to be incomprehensible, because he thinks that is the only way to be respected by the world. And I am afraid he is right; but it is very difficult to be incomprehensible if you have been well taught.

But when I hear one young composer imitating Strauss, and another imitating Debussy, it doesn't annoy me at all: I know it is only a phase in his development, and wait for it to pass. You cannot really suppose that a man wants to go through life imitating others. When he has found out how it is done he will (if he has the chance) pass on to other stages. Anyhow, I do not expect—and no one has any right to expect—that he will really show individuality till he is at least thirty-five. Beethoven and Wagner did not find themselves till they were forty, and Verdi not till sixty. Only, of course, our young men never get beyond their 'first period,' before the end of which they all have to subside into pianoforte teachers.—Yours faithfully,

F. Corder.

OPERA IN ENGLAND.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

Dear Sir,—In your last issue a great deal was said about opera in England, and for years past the small amount of support given to opera has been cited as a proof of the unmusical condition of the nation. The reasoning of Mr. Cecil Forsyth as to the cause is interesting, but very inconclusive. May not the want of support arise from the fact that English people do not appreciate music in that form. Many people do not go to grand opera, because they prefer music by itself or drama by itself.

Lovers of orchestral music are not by any means all opera lovers, and the great increase in the support given to music in that and other forms, shows that England is not so unmusical as the support given to the opera would seem to indicate.—Faithfully yours,

Wallis A. Wallis.

Obituary.

We regret to have to record the following deaths :

Hermann Winkelmann, the first Bayreuth Parsifal, on January 19, at the age of sixty-two, at Maur, near Vienna. He was a member of the Vienna Hofoper for nearly twenty-five years.

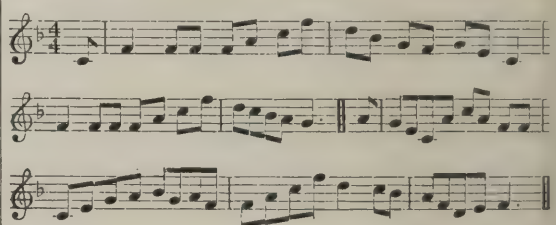
Edmund Singer, in Stuttgart, at the age of eighty-three. He succeeded Joachim and Laub as Konzertmeister at Weimar, and was the companion of Liszt in many of his musical tours. He was the last of the 'Weimaraners.'

'EARLY ONE MORNING.

By Frank Kidson.

The origin of this song, with its pretty tune, is involved in some obscurity, but the following notes carry its history further back than the article in last month's Musical Times. The first trace of the melody I can find is in a small, oblong manuscript book of airs belonging to the Folk-Song Society. When sent to me for examination and identification before purchase, I felt satisfied that the book was in the handwriting of Malchair, the Oxford musician, who assisted Dr. Crotch in the compilation of his 'Specimens of various styles of Music' (c. 1806), for the MS. contains a number of pieces afterwards embodied in Crotch's work.

The air in this manuscript stands thus, headed by the following note: 'From the singing of a poor woman, and two female children, Oxford, May 15th, 1784' :



I reproduce the above by kind permission of the Folk-Song Society.

There can be but little doubt that the ballad singer was singing a folk-song—in all probability 'Early one morning'; but Malchair did not consider it of sufficient importance, or had no opportunity to take this down. Chappell remarks on the great popularity of this song and air among servant girls from all parts of the country, and points out that the song itself varies very much. He indicates where different versions of the words are printed, all of these sources being of the song 'Garland' type of publication. He further tells us that the version then (and now) sung was partly written by Mr. Paul. Chappell evidently means James Paul, who appears to have been literary editor for Catnach, and was afterwards associated with Anne Ryle, Catnach's sister, who took over the business when her brother retired. Then Chappell states that the tune resembles a hornpipe that used to be played at the theatres, and that this was the air for a slang song beginning 'Come, all you young blades that in robbing take delight.' I identify the hornpipe as 'Del Caro's Hornpipe,' which was printed by many publishers in the early years of the 19th century as under :

'DEL CARO'S FAVORITE HORNPIPE' (c. 1801).

In regard to 'Marian's complaint,' the tune of which also bears resemblance, it is found in other early 19th century song-books before Crosby's English Repository (2nd edition), The Nightingale, printed at Portsmouth in America, and dated 1804, The English Minstrel, vol. ii. (Edinburgh, Oliver & Boyd). This latter must not be confused with another English Minstrel, also by Oliver & Boyd. The song, 'Marian's complaint,' set to a different air, is in The Vocal Magazine, vol. iii., an Edinburgh publication dated 1799. The 1807 edition of Crosby does not contain either this song or the air of 'Marian's complaint.'

In regard to the survival of the song 'Early one morning' among present-day folk-singers, Miss Lucy Broadwood writes as follows:—'In the Journal of the Folk-song Society, vol. iv., No. 15, there is a traditional version of the tune, best known as "Early one morning," noted by Miss L. P. Wyatt-Edgell, to words which have subject and several lines in common with the texts quoted by Chappell, but which form quite a distinct version. With the collector's permission, the air and first verse are here given. In the "Journal" I point out that the song in its various forms was probably a stage favourite' :

''TWAS ON ONE APRIL MORNING.'

Traditional, from Cowley, nr. Exeter (1908).

'Twas on one A - pril morn - ing, Just as the sun was ri - sing, 'Twas on one A - pril morn-ing, . . I heard the small birds sing;
They were sing - ing love - ly Nan - cy, For love it is a fan-cy, . . So . . sweet were the notes that I . . heard the small birds sing.

I am afraid I can scarcely agree with Miss Broadwood when she says (in the 'Journal') that she would regard it as 'probably a theatre or a ballad opera song.' I should rank it as pure folk-song.

SIR ALEXANDER MACKENZIE ON RUSSIAN MUSIC.

On February 3, Sir Alexander Mackenzie gave a lecture at the Royal Institution on the subject of Russian Music. Some ten years previously he had lectured on the same topic at the same place, and on this occasion he opened by contrasting the conditions of Russian music at the two periods. The successors of Tchaikovsky, young men of whom little was known but their names ten years ago, had now become in their turn the foremost representatives of their country's art. The lecturer briefly re-told the story of the earlier stages of the national art. At first, he said, there were two factions of musicians who with equal keenness contributed to the rise and success of the national school, although their convictions and methods differed widely—even violently.

'The first,' said the lecturer, 'under the leadership of the two famous brothers Rubinstein—joined in course of time by Tchaikovsky and others of lesser fame—pursued their purpose by grafting upon German art the characteristics of Russian folk-music, dance and song—in fact, of nationalizing the foreign art in which they themselves had been trained. . . . . The other and opposing group of bold young revolutionary spirits held different views: no half-measures for them. The national art must be a new and independent one ; its scientific, theoretic side a secondary, if any, consideration at all. With the exception of one, Balakirev, who, while being a staunch supporter of the new movement, was of the law-abiding kind, and whose restraining influence as a teacher was a power for good, all the rest were undoubtedly gifted, but nevertheless only enthusiastic, amateurs, innocent of any real training.'

Sir Alexander then dealt briefly with the soldier-composer, Moussorgsky, 'a wayward, natural genius, who remained unconvinced of the necessity for a complete musical training'; the soldier-composer Cui, 'another most energetic young rebel'; and the chemist-composer Borodin, who studied in after-life to master the technique and knowledge which he had failed to acquire in early life. He added: 'The men who emerged most successfully from their wild period were just those who pulled up in time to listen to the "stale traditions of the class-room." . . . Of this we have a striking instance in the case of Rimsky-Korsakoff. He is an example of natural gifts and exceptional perseverance in this very direction. Coming quickly to the conclusion that he was helpless without real training, he subjected himself to the severest discipline ; and while he was still in the Navy, was appointed professor in the St. Petersburg Conservatorium—the old enemy's camp !'

The lecturer then described the characteristics of Rimsky-Korsakoff's works, calling attention to their nationality, many-sidedness, and orchestral individuality, and describing them as the first genuine products of the combination of the erstwhile antagonistic schools.

He then passed on to the living generation, pupils of Tchaikovsky, Arensky, and Rimsky-Korsakoff, now in the prime of life and at the height of their activity. Glazounov he placed 'easy first' both in quantity and quality, on account of his extraordinary variety and range (which included everything but opera), his unimpeachable part-writing, learned from Rimsky-Korsakoff, his brilliant instrumentation, his fluency and his facility.

[Here the first movement of Glazounov's fourth Quartet (Op. 64) was played by the Wessely String Quartet.]

The lecturer went on to speak of the Russian school of pianists and pianoforte composers, among whom Alexander Scriabine claimed prominence. He remarked that he had just emerged from the perusal of between seventy and eighty of Scriabine's later pianoforte works, in which he had traced a descent from clearness and a graceful poetic delicacy to wilful obscurity, a rather forbidding eccentricity, and a ponderous technique. Mr. Arthur Alexander then played an 'Album-leaf' in illustration of Scriabine's earlier style and an eccentric piece by Rebikoff.

Rebikoff and Rachmaninoff were then dealt with, and the Andante from Glière's Quartet (Op. 20) was played. Special reference was made to Tanéïew, a brilliant pianist who has, however, devoted his talent as a composer to other forms, especially chamber music. The well-known Variations from his third Quartet, Op. 7, were played as an example.

The characteristic features of modern Russian music were summed up by the lecturer as follows:

'What are the striking prominent points in present-day Russian music as we now know it? In the first place it is generally spontaneous, even to impulsiveness. With the exception of a few pianoforte composers, who choose to wear clothes of French cut, and who hardly count, the really important writers are eminently loyal to their country. With all their laudable modernity—and they cannot be accused of lagging behind the times—they are scrupulously neat and clean in their technical methods. Indeed, in comparison with many present-day composers of other countries, they are conspicuously so. Refinement and delicacy are by no means lacking. In the art of orchestration they are masters; of melody, in the old and popular sense, they have plenty. But chiefly we recognise their power—which extends even to roughness at times—and the exceptionally strong, inborn sense of rhythm, which no doubt accentuates this force. Naïveté, ingenuousness, such as we meet in Bohemian music, is rarer. But in spite of that shade of melancholy which overcasts so much of their folk-tunes, we have a considerable amount of sturdy, robustious humour. Light and flimsy their music is not. Remember that the most popular Russian folk-dances are performed, both by men and women, in long boots! Perhaps in those very boots lies the quality which appeals personally to me most of all: it is that, in contrast to the feverish, bubblesome, mawkish art which is so much in evidence just now, the foremost Russian composers of to-day remain natural, manly and sound. So far from exhibiting signs of weakness or taint of decadence, they are marching in increasing numbers from strength to strength. The subject of to-day's lecture is not so far removed from that of next Saturday's as may be thought. Russian music owes much to Franz Liszt, who was the first to see its inherent possibilities and to encourage the pioneers. Rightly or wrongly, he had his eye on the East for anything novel that was to come. And he said of them: "Their compositions make amends for the boredom which other works, better known, and more highly praised, inflict upon me."'

[We regret that we have not space this month to print a report of Sir Alexander's lectures on Liszt, delivered on February 10 and 17.]

MR. EDWARD GERMAN AT WHITCHURCH.

The invitation given to Mr. Edward German by the Whitchurch Choral Society to conduct their concert performance of his opera 'Merrie England,' on Shrove Tuesday, February 20, was one which reflected honour on the Society as well as on the distinguished English composer, who is a native of this little market-town on the borders of Shropshire and Cheshire. It was the occasion of Mr. German's first public appearance in Whitchurch since 1883, and keen public interest in the affair was aroused, as shown by the crowded attendance in the Town Hall, in which county society was largely represented. There were those present who remembered Mr. German as the exceptionally bright, clever boy who was a general favourite; the boy who had once a great fancy for engineering and would run a mile to see a wheel go round; the boy who started a boy's band (of a kind) at the age of six, and another band when in his teens the; boy who constructed unaided a marionette show, with elaborate scenery painted by himself; and the boy who used to entertain his schoolfellows in Chester with spirit seances, and exhibitions of conjuring skill.

In the representative audience it would have been difficult to find any who had not followed with a proprietorial or wholly friendly interest Mr. German's successful career. This began in his native place at a concert given by the same old Choral Society (then conducted by his first music-teacher, the late Walter Cecil Hay, of Shrewsbury) in the same building, nine and twenty years ago. On that occasion the clever youth conducted the band in his dainty little pizzicato piece 'The Guitar.'

As a Shropshire man, German could have made no better choice of an English county in which to be born. There is no more comfortable, kindly, all-round county in England, with its green pastures, and agricultural system which is the nearest approach to the golden age when each man shall be his own agriculturist. It was here that he must have imbibed that instinctive and essentially English idiom which is such a feature of his music, and inspired in one notable instance those famous 'Henry VIII. dances' which have carried the name of German and the national spirit of England the wide world over.

The opera was preceded by the National Anthem (Costa's arrangement), which was conducted by Mr. W. E. Rogers, the able and esteemed organist of the Parish Church since 1877, who succeeded Mr. Hay as conductor of the Choral Society. In preparing the choral part of the opera, Mr. Rogers had done excellent service, which the composer very cordially acknowledged. A violinist as well as an organ-player, who studied under Dr. E. J. Hopkins, Mr. Rogers treasures an interesting photograph of his old friend Mr. German and himself, taken bareheaded in the garden while playing violin duets en plein air. The photograph induces the thought that had not German become an eminent composer, he would have been an eminent violinist, for it is recorded that while at the Royal Academy Sainton lent German his Guarnerius violin to play the De Beriot and Mendelssohn Concertos upon at an Academy concert and annual examination respectively.

Of this latest performance of the concert version of 'Merrie England' it is due to speak in high terms of appreciation. The vocal principals, Miss Agnes Christa, Miss Gwladys Roberts, Mr. John Roberts and Mr. David Brazell, were selected by Mr. German himself, and sang excellently. They were supplemented by four capable representatives of the choir in Messrs. J. R. Bennett, W. E. Jones, S. D. Stennitt and Leonard Lee. The choir of sixty-six also deserve honourable mention. They were a willing and responsive body of hearty singers who knew their notes and revelled in the pleasure of singing them. The band of twenty-one comprised members of the Hallé Orchestra, led by Mr. S. Haigh.

The amateur members of the Orchestral Society usually take part in the Choral Society's performances. It is pleasant to record their commendable spirit shown in 'sitting out' on this occasion in favour of their professional brethren, who realised very fully the piquant orchestration of the work. Under the composer's keen, watchful and inspiring beat the performance was as delightful as it was memorable. Encores were the order of the evening, the audience seeming never to tire of the inexhaustible flow of lilting rhythms. During the interval a presentation of a gold sovereign-case was made to Mr. German by the Rector of Whitchurch (Rev. Sydney Dugdale) on behalf of the members of the Society. He said that Whitchurch could boast of only one great man, and if only on this account he trusted Mr. German would take great care of himself.

The friendly spirit of the entire audience was subsequently shown by their impromptu singing of 'Auld Lang Syne' (in much too high a key) at the conclusion of the opera. Mr. German must have experienced the real happiness of feeling that he had brought home his sheaves, 'many and heavy, and with blossoms twined of memories that go not out of mind.'

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Falling in with the current fashion—the best of modern times—the Royal Choral Society performed Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion on February 1. The wide divergence between the circumstances under which the performance was given and those that the composer had in mind stood in the way of a thoroughly intimate interpretation, but there was abundant impressiveness in the effect secured, especially in the Chorales. The solo parts were taken by Madame Gleeson-White, Miss Emily Shepherd, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, Mr. Frederic Austin, Mr. Montague Borwell and Mr. Stewart Gardner.

On February 21, the Society gave its usual Ash Wednesday performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius,' with more than the usual success. Madame Kirkby Lunn, Mr. Gervase Elwes and Mr. Harry Dearth were the soloists.

On both occasions Sir Frederick Bridge conducted and Mr. H. L. Balfour was the organist.

MR. JOSEPH ROECKEL'S REMINISCENCES.

One of the most interesting meetings of the Incorporated Society of Musicians was held at the Morley Hall, on Saturday, February 10, when Mr. Joseph Roeckel read a paper entitled 'Some musical reminiscences.' There is a unique charm in personal narration, and for nearly an hour and a half Mr. Roeckel commanded the unflagging attention of his audience. Looking at the still alert and vigorous lecturer, it was difficult to realise that his father was the creator of the part of Florestan in Beethoven's 'Fidelio' as long ago as the year 1806.

Mr. Roeckel was brought up in a musical atmosphere. Not only was his father a celebrated operatic singer, but two of his brothers—much older than himself—were also highly-esteemed musicians, one of them receiving his musical education from his uncle, J. N. Hummel.

It was stated that Mr. Roeckel's father was the creator of the part of Florestan, but it should be mentioned that the opera was performed under the title of 'Leonora' for two nights in the year 1805, its failure then being attributed by Beethoven to the poor singing of the tenor soloist. On hearing Mr. J. A. Roeckel shortly after, Beethoven exclaimed, 'Ah! if I only had had him to sing my Florestan!'

The lecturer told of two visits paid by his father to Beethoven. On the first occasion the visitor was shown into a very untidy room in the middle of which was a large bath-tub in which sat the great composer vigorously splashing himself! The second visit was towards the close of Beethoven's life. Mr. J. A. Roeckel entered the garden where the illustrious man was seated. When Beethoven caught sight of his visitor he held out his tablets, pathetically saying, 'Dear Roeckel, this is what I have come to.'

After an amusing account of his youthful experience as a member of an orchestra, Mr. Roeckel told how, as a boy of fourteen, he was taken by his father to play to Hiller. The piece selected was one in vogue at the time, Hummel's 'La Bella Capricciosa,' but to the young pianist's disconcertment Hiller remarked, 'Before you play your piece let me hear you play the scale of C major in thirds and sixths, beginning at the top of the piano.' Under the circumstances the scale-playing was a rather poor performance, and the lad's father was greatly mortified. Hiller, however, appeared to treat the matter as a huge joke, and fully made amends after the performance of the solo. Soon after this time, in collaboration with a librettist of about his own age, Master Roeckel composed a grand opera and sent it in all seriousness to the director, who returned the work with an equally serious letter explaining that his resources were not sufficient to cope with the production of so important a work.

Among the many musicians of eminence with whom Mr. Roeckel came in contact were Liszt, Von Bülow, Ernst, Wagner, Wieniawski, Cornelius, Tausig and Klindworth, and of these his reminiscences are very interesting. Many hours were spent at Liszt's house listening to the great pianist. It was sometimes difficult to get Liszt to perform, but once induced to seat himself at the instrument, he would go on playing for an hour or more. And for this hour or more his listeners were, to use Mr. Roeckel's expression, 'in paradise.' Mr. Roeckel studied at Würzburg under Eisenhofer, a very dogmatic pedagogue who disapproved of Beethoven and disavowed Wagner. Of Wagner the lecturer had much to relate, of the friendship between Liszt and the composer of 'Tannhäuser,' of the fiasco at the first performance of the opera, of Wagner's personal charm and his sense of humour.

One evening in Paris, Wagner, Edouard and Joseph Roeckel, with Klindworth and a few others, made up a dinner party at a restaurant where there was a celebrated chef. Wagner—rather a gourmet—chose the dinner. Near its close Edouard Roeckel was stealing from the room when Wagner, detecting his object, said, 'No, no, my friend, this is my affair.' Other members of the party claimed the privilege of paying. At length Edouard Roeckel said 'Let the youngest pay.' The lecturer said that he felt rather embarrassed, as he knew that he was the youngest man present. Wagner, looking at him and seeing his embarrassment, said, in a spirit of fun, 'Yes, yes, let the youngest pay.' To his joy Mr. Roeckel found that he had sufficient money with him to settle the bill and pay the waiters their tips. The next morning his brother told him that he never intended that the younger of them should really pay. He himself meant to do that. 'No, my dear boy,' said the other, 'I shall always be able to say that I gave Wagner a dinner, and that will be well worth the money.'

Mr. Roeckel's anecdotes were interspersed with valuable remarks of a critical nature. At the close of the paper the lecturer received quite an ovation. His charming personality, extensive acquaintance, and wide experience make him a delightful raconteur. Mr. Roeckel should write an autobiography.

THE LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

Bach, Beethoven and Brahms filled the programme given by this Society, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Fagge, on Wednesday, February 14, and it was Bach who supplied the newest element, for his short Mass in F was probably unfamiliar to the majority of the audience.

This Mass, one of the four compiled about 1737, is most conspicuous for the majesty of its 'Kyrie,' a chorus a cappella of sustained beauty sung by a choir of four voices accompanied by strings playing in unison with them, while oboes and horns add an independent chorale melody ('Christe du Lamm Gottes'). With his own counterpoint, Bach has added another traditional church melody, the Kyrie of the Litany, sung by basses reinforced by bassoons. The movement was beautifully sung by Mr. Fagge's choir with sufficient elasticity to prevent any feeling of formality, yet with breadth and dignity. The choruses of the 'Gloria,' too, showed that the choir had a thorough command of the music, in which the solo singers in the arias did not equal them. Miss Perceval Allen's words were commendably clear in the 'Qui Tollis,' but neither Miss Gwladys Roberts nor Mr. William Waite equalled her in this. All three gave the impression, which used to be so common but now is generally outgrown, that they were wrestling with a task which they scarcely hoped to make enjoyable, but meant to accomplish with all possible decency.

Miss Gwladys Roberts was happier in the solo part of Brahms's Alto Rhapsody with male chorus. A worthy if not very inspired performance of the beautifully reflective work was given. It was, perhaps, the reflective character which was rather missed, and the singer's tendency to aim at a dramatic style of expression did not quite suit the feeling of either words or music.

The programme was completed with a performance of Beethoven's 'Missa Solennis' in D, the second which the Society has given. In the course of it there was much wholly admirable singing on the part of the choir, and the fact that they had behind them the experience of a year ago was a great advantage to both the singers and the conductor. The whole was better proportioned both in tempi and dynamic effect. The solo singers who had taken part in Bach's Mass, with Mr. Haigh Jackson (tenor), formed the quartet in Beethoven's, and all concerned, including the London Symphony Orchestra, contributed towards a performance which, even if it left some details to be improved, may still be called a very good one.

THE BACH CHOIR.

That such a fine work as César Franck's 'Beatitudes' should have been entirely neglected by London choirs is rather curious. It seemed difficult to believe that the performance of this oratorio by the above choir, on January 31, was actually the first in the Metropolis (though not the first in England). Franck's music certainly ought to find a place in the modern choral répertoire, for much of it has a dignity and spiritual beauty of a kind rarely met with. There are many pages in the 'Beatitudes' that can compare with similar things in Brahms's Requiem or Elgar's 'Gerontius.' The Bach Choir gave a very excellent performance of the music as regards correctness and finish, the interpretation of most of the choruses being well balanced and well sustained.

Dr. H. P. Allen, who conducted with skill and judgment, was always in close touch with the performers. The soloists—Miss Gladys Honey, Miss Leila Duart, Miss Sara Silvers, Mr. John Adams, Mr. Harry Dearth, and Mr. Campbell McInnes—all sang well, the last-named in particular realising to the full the spirituality of the music.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The fourth concert of the hundredth season was given at Queen's Hall on February 8. Sir Edward Elgar conducted. The programme included :

Overture ... 'Coriolanus' ... Beethoven.
Dirge for Strings ... ... Elgar.
(In memoriam The Duke of Fife.)
'The Emperor' Concerto ... ... Beethoven.
Soloist, M. Cortot.
Variations for Orchestra, Op. 30 ... ... Elgar.
Pianoforte Solo ...Andante Spianato and Polonaise ... ...Chopin.
M. Cortot.
Symphony in G minor ... ... Percy Pitt.

The 'Dirge' was written for the Musicians' Company, and had been performed by a string quartet at two of that Company's functions. The present occasion was therefore the first public performance. The work is very characteristic of the composer's reflective idiom. Melody and harmony are suffused with regret and pensive charm. Here and there climaxes suggest passion, but the main mood is a sad one, and yet there is always dignity mingled with the pathos. M. Cortot gave a fine, broad interpretation of the Concerto, and made an excellent impression. The performance of the Variations was one of the finest we have ever heard.

Mr. Pitt's Symphony was unfortunately placed at the end of the programme. It is the composer's only work in this form, and was written for the Birmingham Festival of 1906, and again performed at Queen's Hall on April 18, 1907. It has only three movements: 1. Lento (Allegro deciso); 2. Intermezzo (Sostenuto assai); 3. Finale (Allegro Appassionato). Although the performance was given before a wearied audience, the work made a considerable impression. The ideas are on the whole serious—one could almost weave the story of a tragedy into the first movement—but there is always something worth hearing and of interest to the musician. The orchestration seemed heavy—not in the strenuous manner of some modern composers, but rather in the direction of thickness, even in the quiet passages. The Andante has some beautiful ideas, and the final movement has many moments of brilliancy. There can be no doubt that Mr. Pitt has greatly enhanced his reputation as a composer by this effective work.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

On February 2, a familiar programme was carried out with all the care and refined perfection that Sir Henry Wood and his Orchestra can exhibit at their best. It opened with Chopin's Funeral March, in the conductor's orchestral version, played in memory of the Duke of Fife. Then followed Dukas's 'L'apprenti sorcier,' Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, Brahms's Violin concerto (with Herr Kreisler as soloist), and Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung.'

The presence of the Manchester Orpheus Male-voice Choir lent a unique interest to the concert on February 17, and the resuscitation of Wagner's 'Love feast of the Apostles' made the occasion further remarkable. Apart from the opportunities it gave to the Choir, this somewhat uninspiring pièce d'occasion did not repay in musical interest the trouble that had been spent on it. The Manchester singers lavished upon it all their splendid technique, their unanimity of attack, tone-colour and gradation, and their extraordinary powers of articulation. Their efforts were put to better purpose in Brahms's 'Alto Rhapsodie,' in which Madame Mysz-Gmeiner as soloist contributed to a beautiful performance. The instrumental works in the programme were Svendsen's 'Carneval in Paris' and Elgar's Variations. Mr. W. G. Nesbitt in conducting the work of Wagner showed incidentally a masterful command over the orchestra.

Three extra symphony concerts are announced for March 16 and 23 and April 27.

Mr. Harry Alexander Matthews, a native of Cheltenham and now resident in the United States, has won the prize of hundred dollars for a sacred motett, 'Blessed be Thou, Lord God of Israel,' in a competition organized by the Manuscript Society of Philadelphia.

NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The chief feature of the New Symphony Orchestra's concert at Queen's Hall on February 1, was the first performance of Mr. York Bowen's Symphony in E minor. In many respects the work, which is the second Symphony Mr. Bowen has written, proved well worthy of its prominent place in the programme. It is not very striking in material or design; for though the composer expresses his ideas with great facility and no little power, the ideas themselves are not always fresh; nor, when quite free from reminiscence, are they particularly impressive for breadth and solidity. But the music exhibits an unusual command of orchestral resource. In this direction Mr. Bowen has undoubtedly surpassed his previous efforts, and, having the courage to write gratefully as well as cleverly, he has easily managed to raise his experiments above the merely interesting level. Throughout the work the brass is employed with unusual freedom, but with a sure sense for effect, and in places the score is thick with novel devices; sometimes, indeed, they follow one another so quickly as to create the suspicion that the composer has little or nothing in reserve. But Mr. Bowen is saved from appearing too prodigal or ostentatious by the fact that his effects satisfy the supreme test—they 'come off' naturally. The Symphony, which is dedicated to the conductor and members of the New Symphony Orchestra, was beautifully played under Mr. Landon Ronald's direction, as was also Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole,' in which Signor Antonio de Grassi gave a brilliant reading of the solo part.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Hamilton Harty's bright, picturesque and imaginative tone-poem 'With the wild geese' was performed at the concert of January 29, under the composer's direction, and again aroused gratitude to a composer who could be so buoyant and British in a thoroughly sound and artistic work. Sir Edward Elgar conducted the remainder, which included Mozart's G minor Symphony and Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet.' Madame Clara Butt sang three of the 'Sea-pictures.'

At the concert on February 12 a revised and, it seemed, modified version of Mr. Holbrooke's tone-poem 'The Raven' was given under the composer's direction. It appeared less bizarre on this occasion than when it was produced some years ago; but perhaps this is due not so much to alterations in the music as to the emancipating processes our ears have undergone meanwhile. The music had abundant vitality, but its psychological plan—that of illustrating a poem (Poe's 'The Raven') line by line—was rather bewildering. Sir Edward Elgar was again the conductor-in-chief, and his reading of Schumann's second Symphony drew further attention to his power of finding hidden beauties in music and laying them bare. The soloist of the concert was Mr. Jules Wertheim, who was heard in M. Saint-Saëns's G minor Pianoforte concerto.

London Concerts.

Sir Frederic Cowen's ever-popular 'St. John's Eve' was given a refined and expressive performance at Queen's Hall on January 18 by the Central London Choral and Orchestral Society, under the capable direction of Mr. David J. Thomas. The solo parts were taken by Miss Helena Spicer, Madame Blanche Newcombe, Mr. Ernest Costa, and Mr. Samuel Masters. The 'Freischütz' and 'Ruy Blas' Overtures were among the miscellaneous numbers in the programme.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAS.

A well-chosen programme of familiar works was carried out with customary ease by the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society at Queen's Hall on January 31, under Mr. Arthur W. Payne's direction. Brahms's 'Tragic Overture,' the last two movements from Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony, and Schumann's A minor Pianoforte concerto provided abundant variety and interest. Miss Adela Verne was the pianist, and songs were given by Miss Amy Castles.

The Stock Exchange Orchestra played Beethoven's eighth Symphony agreeably, under the direction of Mr. Landon Ronald, at Queen's Hall on February 7, and also the 'Peer Gynt' Suite and the 'Oberon' Overture. The male-voice choir sang a setting of 'Annabel Lee' by their conductor, Mr. Munro Davison.

Beethoven's second Symphony and Haydn's Violoncello concerto in D (soloist, Miss Vera Poppe) gave an air of rectitude to the programme of the Strolling Players' concert at Queen's Hall on February 13, and a similar quality graced the playing under Mr. Joseph Ivimey's direction. Mr. Landon Ronald's 'Birthday' overture and songs contributed by Mr. Hugh Peyton were among the lesser features of a pleasant evening.

CHAMBER MUSIC.

Lovers of chamber-music have had much reason to thank the organizers of the Broadwood Concerts for the opportunities of hearing the Rosé Quartet that have been provided recently. The superb qualities of the playing of this combination are fortunately well-known, and do not need a tribute of superlatives here. At the concert on February 1, Quartets by Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven were interpreted to perfection. At an extra concert on February 3, the Rosé and Lucas Quartets joined forces in a performance of Svendsen's Octet. On February 9, the Rosé Quartet showed their infallibility by playing quartets by Schubert, Brahms, and Beethoven with unbroken faultlessness.

Mr. Isador Epstein continued his series of chamber concerts at Clavier Hall on January 23, when, in conjunction with Mr. John Dunn (violinist) and Mr. Kolni-Balozky, he played an uninteresting Trio by G. Catoire, and an interesting one by A. Gretchaninov.

'Thursday twelve o'clock' concerts were given at Æolian Hall on January 25, when the London String Quartet played Debussy's Quartet, and, with Miss Mathilde Verne, Dvorák's Pianoforte quintet in A; on February 1, when Mrs. Alice Verne-Bredt's finely-conceived Fantasie trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello was played by Miss Mathilde Verne, Mr. A. E. Sammons, and Mr. C. Warwick Evans. The series was continued on February 8 and 15, and came to an end on February 22.

The chief points of interest at the Classical Society's Concert on January 25 were movements by Rameau for flute with gamba and harpsichord (for which violoncello and pianoforte were substituted), and the first appearance of Herr Thomas Denys, a Dutch baritone of distinguished ability. He and the Klingler Quartet supplied the programme at the concert given on January 31. The same combination gave a classical programme on February 7. On February 14, in the absence of Madame Mysz-Gmeiner, Mr. Leonard Borwick took the whole burden of the concert to himself, and made it a pianoforte recital of great interest.

Mr. Josef Holbrooke commenced his eleventh year of British Chamber Concerts at Æolian Hall on January 25, when an interesting new Pianoforte trio in one movement by Mr. Norman O'Neill was introduced. Mr. Holbrooke's own Fantasie quartet and 'Henry Vaughan' sextet added strength to the programme, and other works added length.

Two movements of a new String quartet by Dr. Ethel Smyth formed the outstanding feature of a concert given by the Society of Women Musicians at the small Queen's Hall on January 25. They were remarkable for an originality which had no recourse to the eccentric.

Brahms's Quartet in C minor (Op. 60) and that of Ernest Chausson in A (Op. 30) were played by the Henkel Pianoforte Quartet at Bechstein Hall on January 27.

Particularly interesting, by reason of its vitality and technical perfection, was the playing of the Sevcik Quartet at Bechstein Hall on January 30 in Mozart's 'Hunting' quartet in B flat and Svendsen's 'Aus meinem Leben' quartet.

The hard-working London Trio gave excellent performances of Brahms's A major Pianoforte quartet (with Mr. E. Tomlinson) and Arensky's D minor Pianoforte trio at Æolian Hall on February 5. The vocalist of the occasion was Miss Florence Miller.

The Wessely String Quartet gave their third concert at Bechstein Hall on February 7, with a programme in which Tanéïew's Variations in D were a notable feature.

On February 13, the Motto Quartet gave a convincing exhibition of their abilities at Æolian Hall. They were assisted in Mozart's G minor Quartet by Mr. T. F. Morris, and in Brahms's B flat Sextet by Messrs. Felix Salmond and Basil Hindenburg.

Two new English String quartets were brought forward by Mr. Dunhill at Steinway Hall on February 16, with Messrs. Antonio Piedra, Edwin Virgo, Eugene Goossens, and Cedric Sharpe as executants. That of Dr. Charles Wood had even more than one expected of freshness and originality expressed in the familiar idiom. That of Mr. Edgar Bainton, based on the subject of Spring, was pleasant and musicianly.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

Franck's 'Prelude, Chorale and Fugue' was the chief number in Mrs. Toni Cohen's programme at Æolian Hall on January 24.

Further recitals were given by Mr. Sergei Tarnowsky at Bechstein Hall on January 25 (Russian composers), February 1 and 8 (various), and February 15 (Chopin), when he gave additional proofs of his ability and versatility.

Madame Rose Koenig, the Wagner pianist whose aim is to perform excerpts from the music-dramas on the pianoforte in a way that makes the nearest possible approach to the orchestral colour and balance of the full score, carried out her aim admirably at Leighton House on January 31.

A clever Air and Variations of her own composition was played by Miss Christian Carpenter as part of her pianoforte recital at Æolian Hall on January 31.

Miss Ursula Newton, a pupil of Busoni, played his six Elegies at Bechstein Hall on February 1, without greatly enhancing his reputation as a composer.

On February 5, Mr. Wesley Weyman gave a recital at Queen's Hall, and in MacDowell's Sonata 'Eroica,' and pieces by Schumann and Chopin showed considerable proficiency. César Franck's 'Prelude, Aria and Finale,' and a group of modern English pianoforte works, were on the programme of Mr. James Friskin's recital at Steinway Hall on February 6.

Mr. Leonard Borwick gave a recital at Queen's Hall on February 6, after his return from a tour in Australia and America, where he has won a reputation, hard to dispute, as the foremost English pianist. He played Beethoven's C minor Sonata, Op. 111, in a style that was both arresting and authoritative; and in Bach, Brahms, Chopin, Debussy, and others, his expressive methods varied with thorough adaptability, while his characteristic lucidity remained constant.

On February 7, at Queen's Hall, Mr. Mark Hambourg gave an exhibition of pianoforte playing in which technique was as usual in the ascendant. Expressiveness took second place, but was not entirely in the background. Madame Bloomfield Zeisler, after a long absence from the concert platform, gave a recital at Queen's Hall on February 9. Mr. York Bowen was as brilliant as ever at Æolian Hall on February 10, especially in a group of his own pieces.

Manchester's retired 'slum-pianist,' Mr. Egon Petri, gave on February 10 the first of three recitals at Bechstein Hall, in the course of which he has proposed to play Liszt's 'Années de pélerinage' from beginning to end. In the first of the three sections he showed a bravura style that was well adapted to the music.

Mr. F. S. Kelly, of 'Diamond Sculls' fame, who was well-known in his Oxford days as a pianist, gave a recital at Æolian Hall on February 20, and showed that in the interval he has added maturity to his characteristic refinement.

OTHER RECITALS.

Both as a composer and as a violoncellist Miss Gwenhilda Birkett showed more than ordinary talent at Steinway Hall on January 31. Her works presented were a Sonata in D for pianoforte, played by Miss Dadine Sutherland, and three pieces for violoncello.

A Suite for unaccompanied violin by M. Sauret, which had little to recommend it for public performance, was played by Miss Ethel Barns at a Barns-Phillips concert at Bechstein Hall on February 3.

Miss Jean Sterling Mackinlay went from strength to strength in her recitals at the Little Theatre on February 8 and 15, when she again held her audience in the grip of her emotional expression. The unique attraction offered by her gifts for singing and acting and characterization are now happily receiving the wide recognition they deserve.

At Bechstein Hall, on February 13, Mr. Lennart von Zweygberg strengthened his claims as a violoncellist of high distinction.

A violin recital was given at Æolian Hall on February 15 by Signor Antonio de Grassi, who gave unequal but interesting readings of Glazounov's Concerto in A minor and Schumann's Sonata in D minor.

The successful young violoncellist, Miss Beatrice Harrison, gave further proofs of her prowess and progress at Bechstein Hall on February 15.

The only vocal recitals we have to record this month are those of Mr. Mostyn Bell, a clever and intellectual lieder singer (Bechstein Hall), Miss Ursula Nettleship (Æolian Hall), Mr. Frederick Keel (Æolian Hall). They all took place on February 16.

The first movement of Elgar's Violin concerto was played creditably by Miss Margaret Holloway, accompanied by Mr. Hamilton Harty, at Æolian Hall, on February 18.

Herr Carl Flesch was hailed on his recent English début as one of the world's leading violinists, and no modification of the opinion seemed necessary after hearing his performance of Bach's 'Chaconne' at Bechstein Hall on February 20.

LONDON SUNDAY-SCHOOL CHOIR.

The annual gathering of the London Sunday-school Choir at the Albert Hall took place on February 10 with great success. The combined thousand voices gave sonorous interpretations of Mendelssohn's 'O come, let us worship,' Goss's 'I will magnify Thee,' Roberts's 'Jesu, priceless treasure,' and part-songs under the direction of Mr. William Whiteman; and the orchestra, besides accompanying, played separate numbers under the direction of Mr. Wesley Hammet. The solo singers were Madame Ada Crossley and Mr. Charles Saunders, the organist Mr. H. G. Holmes, and the pianoforte accompanist Mrs. Mary Layton.

Elgar's 'King Olaf' is not easy to present with an exceptionally large choir and an orchestra chiefly composed of amateurs, even when these constitute the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Allen Gill; and the performance given by this body on February 3 was admirable under the circumstances. In a few numbers, such as 'I am the god Thor' and 'As torrents in summer,' it was superb. The soloists were Miss Carrie Tubb, Mr. Daniel Beddoe, and Mr. Bridge Peters.

'The Creation' and Mendelssohn's 'Athalie' were performed at the Horticultural Hall on January 25 by the rapidly-progressing St. Margaret's Musical Society. The soloists were Miss Viola Salvin, Mr. Geoffrey Garrod, and Mr. Bertram Mills, and the Rev. Jocelyn Perkins conducted. The descriptive verses in 'Athalie' were recited by Mr. Charles Fry.

Mackenzie's 'The Rose of Sharon' was an excellent choice for the Brixton Oratorio Concert given on February 4, and it was excellently performed under the direction of Mr. Douglas Redman, with Mr. Welton Hickin at the organ.

Young people were again invited to Steinway Hall on January 27 to hear good music, after having heard all about it from the lips of Mr. Stewart Macpherson. Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, and a Mozart Concerto, with Miss Elsie Hall as pianist, were the chief works chosen for the occasion. Miss Gwynne Kimpton conducted, and the Hon. Norah Dawnay contributed songs.

The unexpected pleasure of finding Debussy's Nocturnes on the programme of the Royal College of Music orchestral concert on February 15 was enhanced by the pleasure of hearing a very good performance. The remainder included Brahms's Violin concerto (soloist, Mr. Philip Levine) and Beethoven's fifth Symphony.

The annual 'Burns Nicht' Concert of the Scottish Clans Association took place at the Albert Hall on January 27 with uproarious success.

Suburban Concerts.

The Dulwich Philharmonic Society turned their attention to light music on February 3 and performed the concert version of German's 'Merrie England,' which was preceded by Eric Coates's 'Miniature Suite' and Massenet's Prelude 'Le dernier sommeil de la Vierge.' Under Mr. Julius Harrison's direction all the melodious and rhythmic properties of German's delightful music were brought out fully, and his efforts were well backed by those of the soloists, Miss Dorothy Crooksmith, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. George Foxon, and Mr. Julien Henry.

The Lavender Hill Choral Society, which is ably conducted by Mr. George Lane, gave an attractive miscellaneous concert at Wandsworth Town Hall on February 9. The chief work performed, Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-bon' Suite, earned an enthusiastic reception that was due both to the music and an excellent performance. The baritone soloist was Mr. Bevington Rosse. The programme included part-songs, violin and violoncello solos played by Mr. Frank Lane and Mr. C. Crabbe, and songs provided by Miss Carrie Herwin and Miss Kathleen Peck.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's popular new cantata, 'A tale of Old Japan,' was performed with great success by the Crystal Palace Choir and Orchestral Society on February 10. It drew an enthusiastic reception from a large audience, who were charmed by its picturesqueness, pleasant sentimentality and melodiousness, and interested in its favour by a performance of great vitality and technical facility. The solo parts were adequately interpreted by Miss Mary Leighton, Miss Evelyn Aldridge, Mr. Harold Wilde, and Mr. Julien Henry. Mr. W. W. Hedgcock conducted.

A most successful concert was held at St. George's Co-educational School, Harpenden, on Saturday, February 10. The programme included two compositions—one for violoncello and pianoforte and one for pianoforte solo—by a pupil of the school, Mr. D. Wright.

A concentrated version of Gounod's 'Faust,' prepared by Mr. Oswald Laston, was performed in costume by the Sutton Choral and Operatic Society, aided by the Croydon Symphony Orchestra, at Sutton on January 17 and 18 and at Croydon on January 20. So great was the success achieved that a repetition was given at Sutton on February 12. The principal parts were taken by Madame Sobrino (Margarita), Mr. Wilfred Virgo (Faust), and Mr. Harry Reynolds (Mephistopheles). Mr. Laston conducted.

The Ealing Philharmonic Society gave a fine performance of 'Judas Maccabæus' at the second concert of their fifteenth season on February 14, under the conductorship of Mr. E. Victor Williams. A special feature of the concert was the excellence of the chorus work. The soloists were Miss L. Evans Williams, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. George Brierley, and Mr. Watkin Mills, who were eminently successful. Mr. H. W. Pierce was at the organ. Coleridge-Taylor's new work, 'A tale of Old Japan,' is to be given at the next concert on April 27.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

The Birmingham Symphony Orchestra gave a popular Saturday night concert in the Town Hall on January 27, which was of more than ordinary interest, inasmuch as an old Birmingham musician, Mr. Fred. W. Beard, formerly the conductor and trainer of the now defunct City Choral Society, and conductor of many notable orchestral concerts, happened to be in Birmingham on a holiday visit, having for the last five years established himself at Melbourne (Australia) as organist, teacher and conductor, to which city he returns in April; and his old colleagues invited him to appear once more as conductor on this occasion. He naturally met with an enthusiastic reception, and under his beat he realised excellent performances of Wagner's overtures to the 'Meistersinger' and 'Tannhäuser,' Humperdinck's delightful 'Dream music' from 'Hänsel und Gretel,' and Tchaikovsky's 'Elegie for strings.' He also conducted Schumann's Pianoforte concerto in A minor, the solo-part being played by Mr. Julian Clifford with consummate artistic skill. Mr. Julian Clifford conducted his own overture, 'To the New Year,' a melodious work picturesquely scored. The vocalist was Miss Palgrave Turner.

The Midland Musical Society secured an all-round excellent performance of Handel's oratorio, 'Judas Maccabæus,' at the Town Hall on February 3, especially worthy of record being the impressive singing of the choruses, 'We come in bright array,' 'Hail Judea,' and 'See, the conquering hero comes.' The choir now numbers nearly 300 voices, and is well balanced. The principals were Madame Alice Phillips, Miss Emily Rudge (a new contralto gifted with a deep and rich voice), Mr. Samuel Manders, and Mr. James Pugh. The oratorio was conducted by Mr. A. J. Cotton, who also directed Haydn's Symphony in G.

The third Harrison Concert of the current series attracted a crowded assembly to the Town Hall on January 29. It was of the popular ballad type, and evidently appeared to delight those present, the artists having to respond to ten encores (a record). The soloists were Miss Louise Dale, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. William Green, and Mr. Thorpe Bates, Mr. Mark Hambourg (pianist) and Mr. André de Ribaupierre (violinist).

The celebrated Rosé String Quartette from Vienna made their first appearance here at Mr. Max Mossel's third Drawing Room Concert of the season, given at the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, on February 8. No finer combination of players has been heard here since the Bohemian Quartet came to us some years ago. The Rosé combination of artists created a remarkable impression by the unanimity of their ensemble, the luscious beauty of their tone, and above all by the artistic refinement and delicacy in their interpretation of Beethoven's String quartet in A major, Op. 18, No. 5. They played also Hugo Wolf's 'Italienische Serenade,' and, with Mr. Mark Hambourg, Brahms's great Pianoforte quintet in F minor, Op. 34, which received a memorable reading.

The New Choral Society, now conducted and trained by Mr. Miller Johnstone, who has lately settled here and has established a 'Conservatoire of Music,' gave a concert in the Town Hall, on February 10, of unaccompanied part-songs. The choir still needs additional tenors to make the balance quite even, and one may justly expect excellent results in the near future. That the choir is well trained was best shown in the refined and highly artistic exposition of MacDowell's 'Barcarolle,' Brahms's 'In silent night' and 'Love, fare thee well,' and Orlando di Lassus' 'Matona, lovely maiden.' Hubert Bath's part-song cycle, 'Voices of the air,' proved a remarkably original and effective composition which one would be glad to hear again. Miss Ada Forrest contributed songs, and Mr. Clarence Raybould accompanied and played solos.

The fifth and sixth Philharmonic Society Concerts of the season were given in the Town Hall on January 31 and February 14 respectively, and were conducted by Mr. Thomas Beecham. At the first concert the principal work given was Brahms's second Symphony in D, Op. 73, first heard in Birmingham in 1892, under the late Sir Charles Hallé, and subsequently at our Triennial Musical Festival in 1894, under Dr. Richter. Mr. Beecham was much more in sympathy with Brahms than with Sir Edward Elgar's second Symphony, the outcome being a performance of much artistic merit, especially as regards the beautiful slow movement and the wonderful 'Allegretto grazioso.' R. Vaughan Williams's 'Norfolk Rhapsody,' founded on English folk-tunes collected at King's Lynn, Norfolk, was a welcome novelty, and so was Berlioz's overture, 'Les francs Juges.' Mr. William Henley, who is the leader of the orchestra, played Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto with freedom, breadth of tone, and facile technique. The great feature of the second concert was the first appearance here of the celebrated Finnish artist, Madame Ackté, in the final scene of Richard Strauss's 'Salome,' preceded by the 'Dance of the seven veils.' She seemed to live the part even on a concert platform, and her glorious voice soared above the tremendous orchestration. The orchestra was greatly augmented to meet the requirements of Strauss's score, and taking the concert as a whole it was certainly the finest thing Mr. Beecham has so far accomplished in Birmingham. The other orchestral items included Havergal Brian's overture, 'For valour,' a Mozart Minuet for four horns (soli) and orchestra, the Entr'acte from Delius's 'Romeo and Juliet,' the Good Friday music from 'Parsifal,' and the 'Ride of the Valkyries.' The 'Dance of the seven veils' was repeated at the close of the concert.

The Catterall String Quartette gave their third chamber concert of the present season at Queen's College on February 13, realising excellent artistic results with their fine interpretation of Schumann's Quartet in A major (Op. 41, No. 3), Schubert's variations on the 'Death and the Maiden' from the Quartet in D minor, and Debussy's Quartet in G minor, Op. 10. The vocalist was a young débutante, Miss Bergitte Blackstad, the possessor of a rich and powerful contralto voice.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor secured a veritable triumph with his new cantata 'A tale of Old Japan,' given by the Birmingham Festival Choral Society in the Town Hall on February 15, under the composer's direction. His appealing and effective setting of Alfred Noyes's touching poem is just the thing to create popularity, for here all is clear, telling and deeply interesting, and can be understood by the masses. His part-writing is always grateful, and in his orchestration he seems more than ever to have embodied some fascinating touches of local colour which is always a characteristic feature of his art. The performance, especially the work done by the orchestra, was excellent, and the principals—Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Grainger Kerr, Mr. Frank Mullings and Mr. Herbert Brown—rendered valuable service. At the close Mr. Coleridge-Taylor was the recipient of quite an ovation. Dr. Sinclair conducted the rest of the programme, which comprised Wesley's 'In Exitu Israel,' performed with superb tone-power, and Beethoven's monumental 'Choral Symphony,' in which the choir seemed to surmount the trying difficulties with remarkable effect.

The Birmingham Choral Union gave in the Town Hall, on February 17, under Mr. Thomas Facer's conductorship, Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' Trilogy, a work that always attracts a crowded popular audience. The best performance was centred in the second and third sections of the cantata, the first somewhat lacking colour and proper accent. The principal artists—Miss Eva Rich, Mr. John Booth and Mr. Thomas Howell—did admirably, and Mr. C. W. Perkins gave effective help at the organ.

BOURNEMOUTH.

The second half of the Symphony Concert season is now well on its way, and there bids fair to be no abatement of interest on the part of the public, or decline in value as regards the concerts, from that which prevailed in the earlier portion of the series. A conspicuous date was January 25, when the thousandth symphony concert was given by the Municipal Orchestra. Mr. Godfrey has been the conductor from the very beginning, and it is a record of which he may well be proud. The programme on January 25 consisted of Weber's 'Jubilee' Overture, Brahms's Symphony in D, F. H. Cowen's Concertstück for pianoforte and orchestra, in which the solo part was played by Mr. Julian Clifford, and a new Suite entitled 'Sea-fancies,' a very pleasing work by Bournemouth's premier composer, Dr. H. Holloway. At the remaining concerts of the month there were performances of Symphonies by Mozart (in E flat), Ernest Bryson (Symphony No. 1), Schumann (No. 4, in D minor), Beethoven (the 'Eroica'); and the Concertos and soloists comprised Saint-Saëns's Violin concerto in B minor (Mr. Spencer Dyke), Popper's Violoncello concerto in G (M. Jos. Zeelander), Tchaikovsky's first Pianoforte concerto (Miss Tina Lerner), and Max Bruch's Violin concerto in G minor (Miss Marjorie Hayward). Among other attractive items brought forward may be mentioned Humperdinck's 'Die Königskinder' Overture, Lalo's 'Le Roi d'Ys' Overture, Mozart's 'Il Seraglio' Overture, two of William Wallace's symphonic poems—'The passing of Beatrice,' and 'Villon'—Dr. J. Lyon's Suite 'The miracle of the Roses,' Hamilton Harty's Comedy Overture and 'With the Wild Geese' tone-poem, and Percy Pitt's 'English' Rhapsody. All these modern British works were conducted by their respective composers.

That section of the public that boasts a preference for music of a more miscellaneous character has had its taste gratified by visits from Madame Alice Esty (orchestral concert); Mr. and the Hon. Mrs. Julian Clifford (orchestral concert); Mr. Herbert Fryer; Mr. Charles Saunders, Mr. Watkin Mills and party; Miss Louise Dale, Lady Maud Warrender, the Earl of Shaftesbury, and Mr. Pedro de Zulueta (orchestral concert); Madame Aino Ackté, and Mlle. Tosca di Benici and Miss Marjorie Hayward.

A much-needed want in this musical centre has been supplied by the opening of the Bournemouth School of Music. The institution is under the direction of Mrs. Farnell-Watson and Mr. Hamilton Law, and provides opportunities for expert instruction in all branches of music. Mrs. Farnell-Watson, who is the local representative of the Tobias Matthay Pianoforte School, is one of the leading pianists in the neighbourhood, and Mr. Law (who studied composition and singing under Sir Charles V. Stanford and Signor Garcia respectively, at the Royal College of Music, for a period of close upon six years) is not only an active composer and successful teacher, but also a musical critic and a writer upon subjects connected with the art generally.

BRISTOL.

The thirty-first annual concert of the Clifton Choral Society was held at Redland Park Hall on January 30, and a large audience was attracted. The works given were J. L. Roeckel's cantata, 'Mary Stuart,' and H. J. Edwards's motet, 'Praise to the Holiest,' with a miscellaneous selection. The principal vocalists were Miss Hilda Blake, Miss Gladys M. Dyer, Miss M. C. Dennis, Mr. Lionel Venn, and Mr. Lionel E. Doré. Mr. Harold Bernard held the principal violin, Mr. Gilbert Burchill was at the organ, and Miss Hettie Applegate at the pianoforte. Mr. A. Ernest Hill (organist of St. John's Church) directed the performance with ability.

On January 31 the Bristol Symphony Orchestra gave a concert at the Victoria Rooms, and under the direction of Mr. Frank S. Gardner satisfactory interpretations were afforded of several interesting compositions. The principal productions were the first movement of Beethoven's Violin concerto (Mr. Otto Milani, soloist), and the same composer's Symphony No. 7, in A major (Op. 92). Other features were Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' Overture, 'Danse Macabre' (Saint-Saëns), 'Præludium' (Jarnefeldt), and Völkmann's Serenade for strings and violoncello (soloist, Mr. Percy Lewis). The leader of the orchestra was Mr. Maurice Alexander. At intervals songs were given by Miss Winifred Thomas.

The Bristol Royal Orpheus Glee Society held their annual Ladies' Night on February 15 at Colston Hall, and there was a large attendance. Under the capable direction of Mr. George Riseley, a well-arranged programme of old and new compositions was performed most effectively. The following pieces had not before been given by the Society:—'The little Sandman' (arranged by John E. West), 'Let maids be false, so wine be true' (Sir G. C. Martin), 'The land o' the leal' (arranged by H. Elliot Button), 'Lullaby' (C. Lee Williams), and 'Alexander' (Dr. A. H. Brewer). The soloist was Mr. Lloyd Chandos, who took part with the choir in 'I know an eye' (F. X. Chwatal), 'Wake, my fair one' (Gotthard), 'Italian salad' (Genée), and 'Serenade' (F. Abt). These and others which have from time to time been included in the Society's schemes were highly appreciated by the audience.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

Plymouth Orpheus Male-Voice Choir contributed largely to a concert given on January 24 on behalf of Police charities, singing in a manner creditable to themselves and their conductor, Mr. David Parkes. Choruses from Handel, Haydn, Weber, Weekes, and Mascagni were sung on January 31, by a choir of 120 voices, with orchestral support, in the United Methodist Free Church at Plymouth, Mr. R. Lang conducting. The performance was spirited and excellent in tone and rhythm. The King Street Wesleyan Choir gave another of their excellent concerts of part-songs on January 31, conducted by Mr. H. Woodward, and assisted by the Devonia Quartet. The Plymouth Guildhall Choir gave two very fine performances of 'The Dream of Gerontius' on February 3. Mr. H. Moreton, borough organist and conductor, achieved a triumph, having trained the choir to a pitch of exceptional accuracy and artistic expression, and having an excellent band led by Mr. Alexander. The principal vocalists were Miss Alice Lakin, Messrs. H. Turnpenney and R. Chignell.

At their third (of the series) chamber concert on January 31, the Misses Smith had the assistance of Miss May Mukle ('cello) and Miss Dorothy Silk (soprano) and Mrs. H. R. Freeman ('cello). The Phantasie in C minor pianoforte trio by Frank Bridge closed a programme of vocal and 'cello solos given respectively by the two visiting artists.

Elgar's Suite for orchestra, 'Dream-children,' was an interesting number in the programme of Mr. R. G. Evans's symphony concert on February 7, the 'Unfinished' Symphony of Schubert being included; and Mr. Newton's symphony orchestra played the 'Ocean' Symphony of Rubinstein at Stonehouse on February 20.

DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

Ridgway Wesleyan Choir sang 'The feast of Belshazzar' on January 24, conducted by Mr. Goad; and on February 7 Ottery St. Mary Choral Society were assisted by Miss Pender-Cudlip and Mr. A. G. Wills in singing 'The Revenge' and part-songs, conducted by Mr. Stanley Chipperfield. 'The Holy City' (Gaul) was efficiently performed by the Society at Bovey Tracey on February 15, conducted by Mr. W. Back.

The Haydn String Quartet played the Beethoven C major, Op. 57, No. 3, and the Brahms C minor, Op. 51, No. 1, at Torquay on January 25, at their seventeenth concert.

CORNWALL.

The young and enterprising Choral Society conducted by Rev. C. C. C. Bosanquet at Linkinhorne must be encouraged by mention—somewhat belated—of their performance on January 4 of the cantata 'Noel-tide' (Facer) and part-songs. The fine choir of the Bodmin Philharmonic Society gave a highly creditable performance of 'King Olaf' on February 7, conducted by Mr. R. R. Glendinning. On February 8, Charlestown Choir gave a programme of part-songs, conducted by Mr. C. L. Forrester. Mr. H. M. Lamerton's Choral and Orchestral Societies at Bodmin performed 'King Harold' (Cunningham Wood) on February 14, with miscellaneous choruses. On the same date Mrs. Chris Rawling's singing-class gave a programme of part-songs and choruses, with assistance from a choir of male voices, at Saltash. 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin' was sung by Callington Choral Society on February 15, under the direction of Mr. H. P. Giles, assisted by a small orchestra.

Eighteen competitors were heard in an instrumental solo contest at St. Austell on February 17, Mr. J. G. Judd being the judge, and Mr. E. Osborne (euphonium) gaining the first prize.

Organ recitals were given respectively at Falmouth Wesleyan Church, on February 5, by Mr. J. H. Williams, of Truro; at Falmouth Parish Church, on February 14, by Mr. Ewart West; and at Fowey, on February 15, by Dr. H. Walford Davies.

DUBLIN.

The Royal Dublin Society chamber music recitals have maintained their interest. On January 29 Miss Annie Lord, a talented local pianist, supplied the programme.

On February 5 the Rosé Quartet were to have played here for the first time, but the indisposition of the leader prevented them, to the great disappointment of local musicians. On February 12 the Brodsky Quartet, assisted by Dr. Esposito, gave a fine performance of César Franck's Quintet in F minor—the first performance in Dublin of this great work.

On February 16 Dr. Esposito gave a pianoforte recital and played his own 'Three Ballades' (Op. 59)—(a finely-conceived trio of pianoforte pieces)—and Chopin, Op. 58.

The Sunday Orchestral Concerts, of which three were given after the vacation, were brought to a close for the season on February 4 with Beethoven's eighth Symphony in F. The soloists were Miss Queenie Eaton (vocalist) and Dr. Esposito (pianist). The programmes of the other two included Beethoven's seventh Symphony and Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll.' The soloists were Mr. Gerald Murphy and Miss Edith Mortier, Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees (violoncello), and Herr Adolf Wilhelmj (violin).

On February 5, Mr. Cormac O'Shane, a local bass singer, who has been studying in Italy for some time, made a successful début in the Theatre Royal. He had the valuable co-operation of Madame Wilna, Madame Kirkby Lunn, Mr. Joseph O'Mara, Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees (violoncello), with Mr. Hamilton Harty at the pianoforte. On February 13, in the Rotunda, the Commercial Rowing Club gave a concert at which Miss Amy Castles and Mr. Wilfrid Douthitt (two of the greatest 'draws' locally) appeared.

On February 15 in the Gaiety Theatre, the Dublin Orchestral Society gave the first concert for the season. Dr. Esposito, as usual, conducted the following programme: Beethoven's 'Prometheus' Overture; Brahms's Symphony No. 3, in F; Wagner's 'Klingsor's magic garden' (Parsifal); Bizet's 'L'Arlésienne' Suite, No. 1.

On February 9, Their Excellencies The Lord Lieutenant and the Countess of Aberdeen distributed the prizes to the students of the Royal Irish Academy of Music in the Antient Concert Rooms, and there was also a students' concert.

On February 21, Miss Mabel Lander (pianoforte) and Mr. Joshua Watson (violinist) gave a recital at the Antient Concert Rooms. The programme included Brahms's Sonata in D minor, and solos for each artist.

EDINBURGH.

At the tenth of the Paterson Orchestral Concerts, which took place on January 22, the event of the evening was the superb performance by M. Zacharewitsch of the solo part in Elgar's Violin concerto. Under M. Mlynarski's skilful direction, the orchestra, by giving an absolutely irreproachable rendering of the beautiful orchestral score, fairly shared the honours with the soloist. The presentation of this notable addition to concerted music created a profound impression, and at its conclusion M. Zacharewitsch had to respond to numerous recalls. The purely orchestral numbers were Schubert's 'Rosamunde' Overture, Noskovski's symphonic poem 'Die Steppe,' and Goldmark's 'Im Fruhling' Overture.

At the last concert, on February 5, Miss Lucy Gates was the vocalist, and fairly captivated the audience by her brilliant singing of the 'Mad Scene' from 'Hamlet' (Ambroise Thomas) and the Mozart-Adam 'Bravura Variations.' The orchestral items included fine performances of Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony, Spohr's 'Jessonda' Overture, Granville Bantock's Comedy Overture, 'The Pierrot of the Minute,' and the overture to 'Die Meistersinger.'

In aid of a local charity, Mrs. Alexander Maitland's choir and orchestra gave a most enjoyable concert in the Music Hall on January 20. The works performed comprised compositions by Bach, Brahms, Beethoven, and Henschel, and throughout the evening the choir sang with a degree of culture and refinement which left little room for criticism. Mr. George Henschel gave great pleasure to the audience by his singing of songs by Loewe, Schubert, Schumann, and others.

In the University Music Class-room on January 31, the third of Professor Niecks's Historical Concerts was given before a crowded audience. The programme was devoted to performances of Quintets for clarinet and string quartet by Mozart, Weber and Brahms. Mr. R. D. M'Haffie (clarinet) and the Verbrugghen Quartet were the performers. At the fourth concert on February 7, the programme took the form of a recital of organ music by Mr. Edwin H. Lemare, the eminent organist and composer. The programme included compositions by J. S. Bach, Mendelssohn, Rheinberger, Guilmant, Widor, and Lemare, and in these the performer had ample opportunities in which to display his masterly command of the resources of the instrument.

The second of the Millar-Craig String Quartet Concerts took place in St. Andrew's Hall on February 2. The outstanding feature was an exceptionally well-balanced performance of César Franck's Pianoforte quintet in F minor, in which Miss Jean Buchanan played the pianoforte part in a most praiseworthy manner.

Under the management of the Concert School Committee, a concert for young people was given in the Queen's Hall on February 9. The performers were the Verbrugghen Quartet, Miss Ailie Cullen (pianoforte), and Mr. R. D. M'Haffie (clarinet). Professor Niecks as usual prefaced each number with interesting explanatory remarks, and the concert gave evident enjoyment to the large audience.

At a meeting of the Edinburgh centre of the National Song Society, held in the Goold Hall on February 9, Mr. Alan Reid delivered an interesting lecture on 'Allan Ramsay and his songs.' In the course of his lecture, Mr. Reid discussed Ramsay's work as an editor, restorer, and song-writer. Vocal illustrations were contributed by the lecturer, Mrs. Rodger, Miss Reid, and Miss Justice. The accompanist was Mrs. Plenderleith.

GLASGOW.

The first of Mr. A. M. Henderson's chamber concerts on January 25 took the form of a pianoforte and vocal recital with the concert-giver as solo pianist and Mr. George Henschel as solo vocalist. Mr. Henschel's inimitable singing of no fewer than fourteen songs somewhat dwarfed the instrumental programme, which included compositions by Bach, Brahms, Schumann, Rachmaninoff and Scharwenka. One of Mr. Henderson's most successful performances was that of five of Bach's organ choral preludes transcribed for pianoforte by the performer.

At the Choral and Orchestral Union's twelfth concert on January 23, Elgar's Violin concerto was performed for the first time here, Mr. Zacharewitsch giving a highly emotional reading of the solo part. Two other novelties found a place on the programme—a symphonic-poem, 'The Steppe,' by Siegmund Noskovski, and Goldmark's Overture, 'In the Spring.'

On January 30, the Choral Union sang the Easter Scene from 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' Elgar's 'Bavarian Highlands,' and Beethoven's Choral Symphony. In the first of these the performance was somewhat unsatisfactory, the choir failing to keep in tune, but they recovered themselves and gave a spirited reading of the Elgar numbers as well as achieving some success in the Choral Symphony. The solo music was sung by Misses Alice Prowse and Effie Martyn, and Messrs. Henry Brearley and Wilfrid Douthitt. The Scottish Orchestra, under Mr. Emil Mlynarski, played the instrumental part brilliantly. The last Classical Concert, on February 6, was one of all-round excellence. The programme included Glazounow's sixth Symphony, Sullivan's 'In memoriam' Overture, the overture to 'Die Meistersinger,' and a most attractive novelty in the form of Bantock's Fantastic-poem, 'The Pierrot of the Minute.' The admirable singing of Miss Lucy Gates charmed the audience. By the kindness of the management of the Choral and Orchestral Union, the senior classes and junior students attending public schools in the north-western district were invited to a concert by the Scottish Orchestra on February 3. The programme was on popular lines, ranging from the overture to 'Egmont' to a Scottish 'Reel.' It was curious to observe that the numbers best received were those which made the strongest rhythmic appeal, although Handel's well-known Largo in G was encored, possibly because of the fine climax in which the organ supplemented the full orchestra. Altogether the concert was a complete success, and was thoroughly enjoyed by the young people, to most of whom an orchestral performance was a new experience. The closing concert of the season—the annual plébiscite—took place on February 10, when the programme included those hardy annuals without which no plébiscite concert would be complete. The audience was enormous in dimensions and enthusiastic in character, and at the close of the performance Mr. Mlynarski and the Orchestra received an ovation.

The Bach Choir gave a very interesting chamber concert on February 8. The choral numbers were that delightful cantata, 'Phœbus and Pan,' and two national choruses, and the instrumental programme comprised pianoforte solos (excellently played by Mr. Hyllested-Holme), a Suite in C for violoncello solo (Mr. John Linden, soloist), and a Sonata in D major, for violoncello and pianoforte (Mr. Linden and Mrs. Mather). On February 13, the choir of St. Mary's Cathedral, under Mr. G. T. Pattman, made a new departure by giving a secular concert in the Queen's Rooms. Among the most effective of the concerted pieces on the programme were Dr. Walford Davies's clever setting of some nursery rhymes, and Sullivan's 'O Gladsome Light.' Members of the Choir contributed solos and duets, and Mr. J. Connell shared with Mr. Pattman the duties of accompanist.

Two local choirs—the Glasgow Choral Union under Mr. Henri Verbrugghen, and the Orpheus Choir, under Mr. H. S. Roberton—are to try their strength at the great Festival to be held in Paris at Whitsuntide. Their fortunes will be followed with keen interest.

GLOUCESTER.

The members of the Gloucester Orpheus Society gave their fourteenth annual concert at the Shire Hall, Gloucester, on Thursday evening, February 8, and by general consent the event may be written down a brilliant success. There are not many Societies of the size and comparative youth of the Gloucester Orpheus which could afford sufficient 'expense of spirit' to introduce no less than six new numbers in a single evening, and, further, be able to boast that all six were the productions of local or neighbouring composers. While it is a feature that several novelties are heard at each concert, the compositions of the older masters and favourites heard on previous occasions are not neglected. If the Society did not over-top their previous best form, they certainly equalled anything they have hitherto attained. Their singing was hearty and wideawake, and as crisp in attack and in finish as ever, and their pianissimos exquisite. The new contributions of the Society were as follows:—Elgar's 'Feasting, I watch'; Parry's 'That very wise man, old Æsop, said'; 'A Lullaby' and ''Ware Wire,' by Mr. C. Lee Williams, and Dr. A. H. Brewer's 'The Lass of Richmond Hill' and 'Alexander.' The soloists engaged were Miss Edith Evans and Mr. Thorpe Bates. Mr. C. Lee Williams conducted his own compositions, the remainder being in the hands of the painstaking conductor of the Society, Dr. Brewer, to whom much of the success of the concert was due.

The smaller Gloucestershire Choral Societies are doing excellent work. On February 15 the Stroud Society, under the enterprising direction of Mr. S. Underwood, gave a most successful performance of Brahms's 'Requiem.' The band and choir (both augmented from Gloucester) numbered 170 performers. Mr. W. H. Reed led the band, which also played Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony. Miss Alice Baxter and Mr. W. Higley were the soloists.

The chief piece in the programme of the Longhope Choral Society, at their concert on February 16, was Stanford's 'Revenge,' which was sung with fine spirit. The conductor and trainer of this flourishing Society is Mr. A. P. Porter, deputy-organist of Gloucester Cathedral.

The second of the three concerts of the season of the Gloucester Choral Society was given in the Shire Hall, Gloucester, on February 19, before a large audience. The soloists were Miss Amy Simpson, Mr. Downing, and Mr. W. H. Squire (violoncello). The part played by the members of the Society itself was most interesting. The choir sang Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens,' the whole set of Brahms's Liebeslieder (eleven in number) for pianoforte duet and voices, and Elgar's Motet for six voices, 'Go, song of mine.' Dr. A. H. Brewer conducted, and Mr. A. P. Porter and Mr. C. Organ accompanied.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The outstanding feature of the eighth concert of the Philharmonic Society on January 23 was the masterly performance by Mr. Leonard Borwick of the solo part in Brahms's Pianoforte concerto No. 2, in B flat, Op. 83. The performance, conducted by Sir F. Cowen, was one of interest and dignity, as was also the interpretation of Beethoven's fourth Symphony, and another example of immortal music—Mendelssohn's overture, 'A Midsummer Night's Dream.' The vocalist, Mlle. Wilna, sang with success. The choir had their single opportunity, of which they availed themselves con amore, in Max Bruch's Hebrew melody 'On Jordan's banks.'

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' which was produced by the Philharmonic Society on February 6, is a beautiful work which fully sustains the composer's reputation. He has attained an even surer touch of constructive thought, emotion and expression, shown both in the lighter and graver measures of the graceful poem by Alfred Noyes, which deals with the old story and tragedy of unrequited love. Whether in the lyrical features, musical narrative, or dramatic possibilities of the poem, the composer has admirably succeeded. His music is sweet and sustained in its flow, and while he does not seek after novel forms of expression, the suggestion of newness, especially in the harmonic treatment, is delicately present. Written for four solo voices, chorus and orchestra, the music is remarkable for local colour without obvious recourse to the Japanese scale. The orchestral part is inventive and resourceful, and while the leit-motif is not adopted there is one little roguish, wistful figure of which significant use is made, firstly in the prelude and lastly in the tragic closing bars, where it conveys a sense of sadness and desolation. The vocal solos are not detachable, and the singers together with the choir take their part in the narration. The chorus music evidently attracted the singers, and the choir sang extremely well throughout. The vocal principals were Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Frederic Austin.

Sir Frederic Cowen also conducted a first performance here of Debussy's 'Blessed Damozel,' a choral work dating from 1886, when the composer held the famous Prix de Rome scholarship. It is a sufficient commentary on the rate of recent musical development, and upon what Wagner termed 'the illimitable cultivability of the ear,' that the work was heard in Liverpool on this occasion with attention and appreciation.

At their concert on January 16, the Akeroyd Symphony Orchestra played a Wagner selection which included the four well-known overtures and 'Lohengrin's Narration,' well sung by Mr. Maurice D'Oisly. In Vieuxtemps's Violin concerto in E, Op. 10, Mr. Rodian Mendelevitch displayed more digital skill than strength of tone. At the sixth concert, on January 30, Mr. Akeroyd conducted a steady performance of the C minor Symphony, and novelties heard with approval included Bantock's quaint and original Oriental dances—(1) 'Snake'; (2) 'Veil'; (3) 'Dagger'; and Sibelius's Suite, 'Karelia.' The vocalist, Miss Edith Evans, was specially successful in singing Weber's trying 'Ocean, thou mighty monster.'

To the Societa Armonica belongs the credit of introducing to Liverpool an orchestral work by Max Reger, whose Serenade in G, Op. 96, in four movements, was played at their concert on January 27. The work is one of great musical beauty, and came as a surprise to those who had hitherto associated Reger with dryness. This particular work shows inspiration as well as masterly technique. Another novelty of quaint charm was Maurice Ravel's 'Pavane pour une Infante défunte.' Miss Nelly Briercliffe was an acceptable vocalist, and Miss Mary McCullagh exhibited skill and taste in playing Saint-Saëns's Violoncello concerto in A minor. Mr. V. Akeroyd conducted.

The Welsh Choral Union were assisted by Madame Clara Butt, Mr. Kennerley Rumford, and Mr. Zacharewitsch (violin) at their concert on February 3. Chorally the programme gained distinction by the fine singing of Bantock's 'On Himalay,' Morley's 'Fire, fire my heart,' Elgar's 'Lullaby' and 'The Dance' ('From the Bavarian Highlands'), and Harry Evans's new arrangements of two Welsh airs for chorus and orchestra, 'David of the White Rock,' and the Welsh National Anthem, 'Land of my fathers,' during which the immense audience stood. On this occasion Mr. Harry Evans also showed resourceful orchestral command in the 'Oberon' Overture and Schubert's 'Unfinished Symphony.'

The social evenings of the Rodewald Concert Club continue in favour. The music on January 29 was provided by the Rawdon Briggs String Quartet, an excellent combination of skilled players. On February 12 the 'O.M.' Male-voice Choir sang, conducted by Dr. S. B. Siddall, of St. Helens, and two young leaders among local pianists,

Mr. Frederic Brandon and Mr. Douglas Miller, played Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by Beethoven, Op. 86, 'Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve' (Moussorgsky), and Valse, Op. 15 (Arensky), for two pianofortes. The splendid singing of the 'O.M.' choir of twenty-two tenors and basses evoked general admiration. In their wide selection of pieces in all styles English composers were well represented. Dr. James Lyon's 'Roman war song' was one successful example.

Local Societies which cultivate the glee and madrigal are too few in number, and the concert of the Fairfield Glee Society on January 30 deserves mention for a varied programme, which contained Wilbye's 'Sweet honey-sucking bees,' Elgar's 'Weary wind of the West,' and Brahms's 'Dirge of Darthula.' The conductor was Mr. Arthur Davies. Another local Society, the Walton Philharmonic, eighty voices strong, gave a creditable performance of Elgar's attractive 'Banner of St. George' on January 18, with Madame Cearns Owen and Mr. G. R. Barnett as principals. The accompaniments were sustained by Mr. Branscombe (pianoforte) and Mr. C. Collins (organ), and Mr. Albert Orton conducted.

Mr. Percy Harrison provided a generous array of first-class talent for his third concert on January 31. The artists included Miss Louise Dale, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. William Green and Mr. Thorpe Bates. Mr. Mark Hambourg was the pianist, and M. de Ribaupierre the violinist.

The musical recital given on February 8 by two gifted and highly-trained young artists, Miss Teresa Amalfi (mezzo-soprano) and Mr. Douglas Miller (pianist), deserves recording in terms of appreciation and encouragement.

Recent lectures on musical subjects have included 'Chamber music,' by Mr. Raymond Tobin, on January 30, and 'The rise of Oratorio,' upon which Mr. Albert Workman lectured to the local section of the I.S.M. on February 10.

The Liscard Orchestral Society, a powerful combination conducted by Mr. Philip Smart, gave a successful concert on February 10, at which Mr. Walter Hatton played Böellman's Symphonic variations for 'cello, Op. 23, and Madame Naomi Bell sang.

The West Kirby Choral Society gave evidence of Dr. W. B. Brierley's able direction of good material on February 12, performing Elgar's 'The Black Knight,' Walmisley's madrigal, 'Sweete Floweres,' and Stanford's pastoral, 'Shall we go dance?' Mendelssohn's Violin concerto was cleverly played by Miss Dorothy de Vin, accompanied by the excellent small orchestra led by Mr. A. Ross. The vocalist was Mr. Charles Tree.

MANCHESTER.

The mere account of musical events in recent weeks is of quite secondary importance alongside the announcement made in the Press on January 29, that the Hallé executive had entered into a three years' agreement with Mr. Michael Balling as conductor of the Hallé concerts, the duties commencing next October. The executive considers it in the best interests of orchestral music here and in other centres of the North that the Richter regime should be perpetuated. A good deal more, however, will have to be taken on trust in Balling's appointment than was the case with Richter. There is just one possible development which would add greater weight in the choice of Balling, and that is in matters operatic. Should some form of co-operation between the Hallé Orchestra and one of the theatres make possible in the near future a permanent Grand Opera season, then not Manchester only but the whole North of England would have occasion to rejoice.

On January 25, Manchester was for a brief space the centre of musical interest in Britain. Bantock's 'Atalanta in Calydon' evoked considerable interest, and choral-lovers from all parts were present in force. The Hallé Choir is the one choir in Manchester which has had comparatively little experience in alla cappella music—in recent years one only recalls three occasions when it has sung without accompaniment. A work on the scale of Bantock's choral symphony is sufficient to tax to the full the powers of any choir, even after it has studied the work for six months and had no other choral work to distract its attention; but until the New Year this choir has not been able to concentrate on it, and the concluding rehearsals clearly demonstrated that the first performance could not be even approximately note-perfect, not to mention any other refinement of good choral singing. The choir went through the trying ordeal with considerable courage, but the results in the first two movements were nearly chaotic at times. The Scherzo for women's voices, comparatively simple in design as it is, produced better singing, and the applause seemed to nerve everybody for the big final movement (only published at the beginnning of December), and oddly enough this very exacting section was sung with greater freedom than anything else. In this first performance there were only fugitive glimpses of the many wonderful beauties embedded in the Symphony. Moderately sung as it was, the composer's ideas were clearly possible of realisation, and it is not to be doubted that another few years will make 'Atalanta' as possible of attainment as has been, say, 'Gerontius'; to some extent a technique will have to be evolved, but our choirs to-day are much better fitted to tackle the difficulties of Bantock's idiom than they were in 1901 to face Elgar's (then) new type of choral expression. Report has it that the Hallé Choir will repeat the work next autumn, after devoting further rehearsals to its more complete preparation.

Of the very young conductors who have appeared this winter none has excelled Ossip Gabrilovich, the one time pianist. Only twenty-six years of age, he has studied under Nikisch, and has the makings of a really first-class conductor. Not even his great exemplar surpasses him in rhythmical strength and beauty; on February 1, he conducted Beethoven's 'Coriolan,' the 'Pathetic Symphony,' a Grétry-Mottl ballet-suite (Céphale et Procris), and Liszt's 'Les Préludes,' entirely from memory, and in the last obtained a sublimity of effect that even Richter might have envied. The attitude of our Hallé audience towards Liszt's music has been one of the curiosities of the season. Hitherto his works have been received quite tepidly; now, no work of his this season but has had quite an ovation. There can be no doubt than Hans Richter sowed the seed of this revival.

On February 8, Sir Frederick Bridge conducted a performance of 'Elijah' that was very well received; the singing of Mr. Herbert Brown in the part of the Prophet was conspicuously good.

The Hallé concert conducted by Sir Henry Wood on February 15, brought us Saint-Saëns's third Symphony (never before heard here), and two novelties of slenderer proportions in Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's dance,' and Georges Enesco's 'Roumanian Suite.' Some felt these sparkling miniatures hardly consorted with the stately dignity of Hallé traditions; criticise as folks may, there is no gainsaying the fact that the Hallé audiences have been more 'live' this season than since the earlier days of Richter's conductorship, and Wood has played no small part in wakening us up. Miss Muriel Foster at the last moment was unable to come, and her place was filled by Miss Doris Woodall, one of the best exponents of the rôle of 'Carmen' ever heard in Lancashire; another and quite unexpected side of her art was revealed in very illuminating performances of German lieder.

For some weeks past there have been vague rumours of a fresh series of orchestral concerts; the Manchester Musical Society had been mentioned in such a connection, but on February 19 the important announcement was made that, commencing next season, Mr. Brand Lane had arranged for Sir Henry J. Wood to conduct a series of Saturday and Monday evening concerts on the lines of the Queen's Hall 'Promenades,' having at his disposal a band of about eighty players. Thus, whilst it may be a matter of some regret that Sir Henry J. Wood is not associated with our premier organization, it is gratifying to know that his stimulating influence will not be lost to South Lancashire.

A concert of quite unusual interest was that given on February 7, in aid of the Distressed Foreigners' Fund; the Manchester Orpheus Society, as the recipients of very marked favours on the occasion of their Rhineland visit last Whitsuntide, gave of their best. Brahms's 'Alt-Rhapsodie' was the most extended work; here again illness played havoc with the solo arrangement, Miss Myra Dixon being unavoidably absent. At twenty-four hours' notice Madame Gertrude Brooks stepped into the breach, and must be congratulated on her preparation of such a work in so short a time. This performance was somewhat in the nature of a 'trial run' for the London Queen's Hall Orchestra's symphony concert on February 19, and it is gratifying to find other opinions on the choir's merit in this work abundantly confirming one's own. As showing the grip of Bantock's most advanced choral work on an average audience, it should be noted that 'Lucifer in Starlight,' so superbly sung by Mr. Nesbitt's men, was encored, and still more enthusiastically received on its repetition. Mr. George Parker, a fine bass singer of Manchester Cathedral, also sang on this occasion with great distinction. He goes shortly to Westminster Abbey.

Music played an unusually important part on the occasion of the festivities in Manchester in connection with the Kaiser's birthday. Wolf-Ferrari's operetta, 'Susannen's Geheimniss,' was given in German, the title-rôle being taken by Miss Theresa Schlagintweib, and Mr. George Parker playing the suspicious husband, Graf Gil.

Two concerts of chamber music, on January 31, were of unusual interest. In the afternoon, at the Gentlemen's Concert, Dr. Theo. Lierhammer sang a severely-chosen set of Schubert and Brahms songs. Perhaps his style gravitates naturally towards the sombre; but although this recital seemed somewhat restricted in its scope, there was much to admire.

The evening's Brodsky Quartet concert brought a new Octet for strings in A major, written by Mr. F. Bonavia without the usual Scherzo. As previously remarked here, this composer's art is full of subtle, elusive fancies, possibly lacking that unity in variety which the perfect art-form must have: a string-player himself, it was to be expected that the work would prove grateful to the performers.

The Burnley Vocal Society varied its usual procedure by allowing the Hamilton Harty Wood-wind Quartet to take the principal burden at their concert on February 6. Quintets by Mozart and Beethoven, and the Brahms Sonata in E flat for clarinet and pianoforte (with Mr. Harty), were the chief instrumental items, although a Reverie for horn by Glazounov proved a perfect gem. Mrs. Swinton was the vocalist, and the choir performed Elgar's 'From the Bavarian Highlands' choral songs.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE AND DISTRICT.

Beethoven's 'Missa Solennis' has never been heard hitherto in this district, so that much interest attaches to the announcement that this great work will be given at the second concert of the Choral Union next season. Granville Bantock will reappear at the first, and conduct Part I of 'Omar Khàyyam,' and the 'Dante and Beatrice' symphonic-poem. Three 'Celtic Sketches' were played by the Philharmonic Orchestra on February 1. They are from the pen of the conductor, Mr. E. L. Bainton, and are based on the idylls of Fiona MacLeod. They are entitled 'Sea-Sorrow,' 'Sea-Rapture,' and 'Pharais.' The first is the most original, and is a fine lament of haunting melancholy. The second is less convincing, but the third, an impression of the Celtic Paradise, contains some impressive climaxes. They are among the best works this composer has yet produced, and point an advance in the emotional nature of his conceptions. Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony was perhaps played the least sympathetically of all the other items. The 'Peer Gynt' Suite, and three widely-differing overtures—Cherubini's 'Anacreon,' Dvorák's 'Carnival,' and Wagner's 'Meistersinger'—completed a programme which reflected credit on the men and on their chief.

There are three chamber concerts to record, one to the account of each of our local Societies. The Sevcik Quartet gave brilliant and incisive readings of an interesting Quartet by Glazounow, Op. 64, No. 4, Smetana's great 'Aus mein Leben,' and Haydn's Op. 77, No. 1. A fine concert was marred by a wholly inappropriate selection of songs. Mr. Friskin exhibited his splendid pianoforte technique in Franck's beautiful 'Prelude, Aria and Finale' and two modern British works by the performer and Frank Bridge at the Newcastle Musical Society's concert on January 31. He also, with Mr. Alfred Wall, gave flawless performances of pianoforte and violin sonatas by Beethoven and Brahms. Mrs. George Dodds sang with taste. The Langley Mukle Quartet suffered from a too prominent and forceful first violin in their performance of Beethoven's late E flat and Mozart's D major Quartets at the last concert of the Classical Concert Society on February 5. Miss Mukle played finely Schumann's dull 'Stücke im Volkston' for violoncello, and Miss Dorothy Silk sang some Italian arias and a group of Wolf songs with perfect limpidity of voice in the one set, and earnestness and intellectuality in the other.

On Friday, February 2, a miscellaneous concert was provided for Mr. Harrison's subscribers.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

The Long Eaton Orchestral Society gave their second concert of this season on February 6, when the programme included the 'Ruy Blas' Overture (Mendelssohn), the first movement of Beethoven's fourth Symphony, Elgar's 'Bavarian Dances,' 'Minuet d'amour' (Cowen), and the introduction to Act III. of 'Lohengrin' (Wagner) for the orchestra, which gained great credit for the Beethoven work. Miss Emily Breare and Mr. Morgan Kingston contributed vocal items, and Mr. Jacques Renard 'cello solos. Mr. Mountney and his fellow-workers are to be congratulated on the result of the season's efforts.

Granville Bantock's 'Omar Khàyyam' was produced for the first time at Nottingham on February 8, at the Sacred Harmonic Society's third concert, under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill. Much time and labour had been devoted to this production, and the general result reflects great credit on the choral work, and as a first performance entails so much expenditure of time and money it would be a pity if the work were not heard again. The novelty of the part-writing, where the voices are employed orchestrally, demands more attention than one performance allows. The Caravan scenes certainly took a keen hold of the audience. The programme of the second part was filled with familiar items. The artists were Miss Alice Lakin, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Frederic Austin, who all supported the production by the sincerity of their work.

The Nottingham Subscription Concert on February 20 included in its programme vocal items by Miss Louise Dale and Mr. Thorpe Bates, violin solos by Miss Marie Hall, and pianoforte solos by Miss Cantelo. A good audience attended the performance of Gaul's 'Joan of Arc' by the Riddings Choral Society on February 14. The solos were undertaken by Miss Ida Bloor, Mr. W. Hudson, and Mr. Harry Horner.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The promoters of the Sheffield Promenade Concerts are justifying their faith by the character of their programmes and performances, while the public, in turn, are attending in steadily increasing audiences. The orchestra has been increased to sixty-five, and its quality further improved in several departments. A picturesque and often brilliant performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 was rivalled in interest by a technically polished and imaginative performance of Schumann's Pianoforte concerto in A minor. Miss Ivy Parkin, the soloist, played with notable beauty of tone and well marked but flexible rhythm. Mr. H. Mortimer played the solo in Weber's Concertino in E flat for clarinet and orchestra, phrasing with nice taste and producing a luscious, well-controlled tone. Shorter works by Mozart, Wagner and Bach ('Wachet auf,' arranged for strings and horns by Professor Bantock) completed the programme. Mr. J. A. Rodgers was the conductor. Miss Dorothy Silk sang art-songs with perfect diction and much charm of style.

The suburban choral Societies usually defer their second concerts until mid-spring. The Sharrow Choral Society, however, departed from custom and gave a successful winter concert, performing Beethoven's Mass in C and Stanford's 'Phaudrig Crohoore' with a score of choral merits and but few failings, the chief of the latter being lack of balance. Mr. O. C. Owrid conducted.

Several interesting organ recitals have been given in the Albert Hall and at the Parish Church, where Mr. Hanforth's fortnightly recitals are much appreciated. Mr. E. H. Lemare, a former organist of the Parish Church, won a crowded audience to the Albert Hall on his reappearance in Sheffield after a lapse of seven years. He played Mendelssohn's Sonata No. 6, some Wagner pieces, and a group of his own compositions.

At a chamber concert given by the Manchester Trio (Messrs. Edward Isaacs, Arthur Catterall and Carl Fuchs) a Trio in E flat by Mr. Isaacs was performed. The texture of the music is good; in design and handling it follows the best models and makes a good effect. The themes are hardly equal to the craftsmanship, but the work proved interesting and one would like to hear more of Mr. Isaacs's scholarly music.

A performance of Cowen's 'The Rose Maiden' by the All Saints' Choral Society (conductor, Mr. R. Bellamy), and a joint recital by Miss Edith Bingham (pianoforte) and Mr. John E. Bingham (violin), each of whom displayed musical aptitude, are also to be chronicled.

The Chesterfield Musical Union is rapidly taking up an important position in North Derbyshire musical circles. That the choir improves at each concert was proved by their spirited and expressive singing in Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' under the direction of Mr. J. F. Staton.

YORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.

For the Philharmonic Concert on February 7, Sir Edward Elgar was invited, and he conducted the Hallé Orchestra in a programme that included his second Symphony, which had not previously been heard in Yorkshire. It was a good, if not a brilliant, performance, while as to the impression it made, one might perhaps say that it was deepest on those who knew it best, while many to whom it was strange found themselves bewildered by its wealth of detail. The chorus, 'Go, song of mine,' was finely sung by the Philharmonic choir, but the male-voice part-song, 'Reveille,' lost something of its effect by the two halves of the choir being out of touch with each other. The rest of the programme was of familiar things, the 'Zauberflöte' Overture, 'Peer Gynt' Suite (No. 1), and Bach's fourth 'Brandenburg' Concerto.

On January 24 the Rasch Quartet played Beethoven's String quartet in A minor (Op. 132), and, with Mr. Percy Richardson as pianist, gave a brilliant interpretation of Brahms's Pianoforte quartet in A. On January 31 the Leeds Bohemian Quartet had its programme upset by the absence of one of the party, but made up an enjoyable programme with Debussy's first Clarinet rhapsody, a violin and pianoforte Suite by Bernard, and York Bowen's effective 'Miniature Suite' for flute and pianoforte, which were artistically played by Mr. Louis Booth (clarinet), Mr. Whitelock (flute), Mr. Elliott (violin), and Mrs. Elliott (pianoforte). Another excellent chamber concert was that of the Leeds Trio on February 14, when Rachmaninoff's 'Elegiac' Trio was, according to the programme, given for the first time in England. It is a powerful, strongly-coloured work, showing the influence of Tchaikovsky, to whose memory it is dedicated, and it was played with brilliance and sympathy by Messrs. Cowen, Hemingway, and Herbert Johnson.

Messrs. Mason and Maude have, on January 26 and February 16, continued their recitals of sonatas for violin and pianoforte, and on February 20 the Leeds Musical Evening introduced two young artists—a violinist, Miss Helena Kontorovitsch, and a pianist, Miss Mildred Langley. The Leeds Symphony Society, an amateur organization, gave a concert on February 13, at which, under Mr. Hoggett's direction, were given Mendelssohn's early Symphony in C minor, and, with Miss Elsie Suddaby as soloist, the same composer's Capriccio brillant for pianoforte and orchestra. Mr. W. T. James was the vocalist.

BRADFORD.

At the Bradford Subscription Concert on February 2, the Hallé Orchestra appeared and, conducted by Mr. Gabrilowitsch, gave a reading of the 'Pathetic' Symphony which disappointed a good many (whether agreeably or otherwise) by its restraint. It was, however, a fine musical interpretation, and an excellent performance. The dainty Suite which Mottl arranged from the ballets in one of Grétry's operas, and a brilliant performance of Liszt's 'Les Préludes,' were other features of the concert. Miss Agnes Christa was the vocalist. At the next concert of the series, on February 16, Miss Marie Hall was the violinist, Mr. Mark Hambourg the pianist, and Miss Doris Woodall's singing of some modern German songs was one of the best features of the concert.

The concert of the Bradford Permanent Orchestra on January 27 was conducted by Mr. A. W. Payne, who gave a carefully-finished performance of Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony, of the same composer's 'Carnival' Overture, and of three characteristic Wagner pieces. Miss Mabel Manson and Miss Clara Baxandall were the vocalists. Mr. Allen Gill conducted the fourth concert of the same series, at which Miss Ethel Leginska played, with remarkable charm of style, Rubinstein's D minor Pianoforte concerto, and a pretty 'Miniature Suite' by Eric Coates was given. Miss Marjorie Leighton was the vocalist. The Free Chamber Concerts arranged and managed by Mr. S. Midgley continue to attract good and interested audiences. On January 29, Dvorák's Pianoforte quintet, with String quartets by Beethoven and Haydn, formed the programme, while on February 12 Brahms's Pianoforte trio in B (Op. 8) was given in its original form, and for the sake of the weaker vessels in the audience, divided into two parts, one at each end of the programme. Grieg's Violin sonata in F was given, by way of a bonne bouche, between. All these pieces were adequately performed by local professional artists, and local singers gave a variety to the programmes.

OTHER TOWNS.

The Huddersfield Subscription Concert on February 6 was of a mixed type, consisting of a recitation by Mr. Alexander Watson of 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' interpersed with Mendelssohn's music. The orchestral pieces were given with fair success by the Huddersfield Philharmonic Orchestra, an amateur body, under Mr. Ibeson, while a ladies' choir, under Mr. D. W. Evans's direction, sang the 'Fairies chorus' very prettily, and a young girl pianist, Miss Mildred Langley, played Liszt's adaptation of the 'Wedding March' very pleasingly. At the Wakefield Chamber Concert on February 8, Mr. Herbert Withers, the violoncellist, with Mrs. Withers as pianist, introduced some interesting modern music, Dohnányi's artistic and effective Sonata in B flat minor (Op. 8), and a Sonata in one movement by Jean Huré. Both received a really brilliant and masterly interpretation. Miss Rhoda von Glehn was the vocalist. At Harrogate the Choral Society, by way of an agreeable relaxation, invited Mr. J. M. Glover and his military band to give a concert on February 10. The music, if not very elevated, was suited to the occasion, and under Mr. Glover's very picturesque beat was played quite smartly. Mr. Charles Tree sang some songs with admirable point and effect. The Subscription Concert at Malton on February 13 consisted of a pianoforte recital by Miss Adela Verne, whose brilliant virtuosity was astounding, especially in Liszt's startlingly clever transcription of the 'Tannhäuser' Overture. Mr. Roland Jackson was an artistic vocalist. On January 23 the Hull Vocal Society, conducted by Dr. G. H. Smith, gave an interesting programme of unaccompanied choral works, including Bach's motet, 'Blessing, glory and wisdom,' Samuel Wesley's noble motet, 'In Exitu Israel,' and Tchaikovsky's chorale, 'Hymn to the Cherubim,' as well as some modern pieces, in very artistic style. Miss Phyllis Lett and Mr. Herbert Brown were the soloists.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

AYLESBURY.—The enterprise of the Vale of Aylesbury Harmonic Society in performing Parry's 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin' and Smith's 'Ode to the North-east wind' on January 30 deserved better support than it received. Labouring under the difficulty of diminished numbers, the Society needs every encouragement to proceed with its spirited policy. Mr. W. H. Parker secured some choral singing that was highly creditable, and further interest was added by the work of the soloists and the independent contributions of the orchestra.

Brampton.—A highly creditable performance of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' was given on February 9 by the Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. F. Drakeford. The solo parts were taken by Miss Isa Walton, Mr. John Collett, and Mr. Peacock.

Brighton.—The Brighton Sacred Harmonic Society, which produced Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-Bon' Suite at the Festival of 1909, renewed acquaintance with it for their concert of February 8, and gave a performance full of vitality. Mr. Julien Henry was the baritone soloist. The remainder of the programme consisted of Barnett's 'The Ancient Mariner,' in which the solo parts were taken by Miss Alice Venning, Miss Mabel Corran, Mr. William Maxwell and Mr. Henry. Mr. Robert Taylor conducted.

Bromley.—The Choral Society had a great success with their recent performance of German's 'Merrie England,' under the direction of Mr. F. Fertel. The soloists were Miss Dora Mason, Miss Maude Clough, Mr. Frederick Blamey and Mr. Dan Richards.

Cairo.—A violoncello recital was given at Shepheard's Hotel, Cairo, on January 26, by Mr. B. Walton O'Donnell, accompanied on the pianoforte by the Countess de Lavison. The programme included Richard Strauss's Sonata in F, Saint-Saëns's Concerto in A minor, Grieg's Sonata in A minor, Popper's 'Ungarische Rhapsodie,' and 'Two Irish tone-sketches,' (1) Colleen and (2) Gossoon, by the concert-giver.

Cardiff.—A very successful violoncello and dramatic recital was given in the Y.M.C.A. Hall on February 20 by Miss Dorothy Bentall. Her instrumental programme included the Grieg Sonata in A minor, the Boëllman 'Variations Symphoniques,' and the 'Legende' by d'Ambrosio, all of which were interpreted with artistic feeling.

Chelmsford.—Mr. Frye's Choral Society gave their second and closing concert of the season on February 19, at the Shire Hall. The choir gave three 'Old sea chanties' (Fagge), 'Angelus' and 'Go, song of mine' (Elgar), 'Sweet honey-sucking bees' (Wilbye), and three old Scotch songs. The singing was excellent in tone and interesting in expression. The Wilby String Quartet (G. H. Wilby, E. R. Wilby, C. Woodhouse and C. A. Crabbe) gave a fine performance of Schumann's Quartet in A, Op. 41, No. 3, and Frank Bridge's 'Phantasie.' Miss Richenda Clayton was the soloist, and she was encored in her selection of old Somerset folk-songs. Mr. G. Wilby and Mr. C. A. Crabbe gave violin and 'cello solos. Mr. F. R. Frye conducted.

Chichester.—The Orchestral Society gave a concert, under Mr. F. J. W. Crowe's direction, on February 12, the programme of which included Grieg's 'Holberg' Suite, Debussy's 'Petite' Suite, the Largo from Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony, and other attractive numbers. Miss Beatrice Overton (soprano) made an excellent impression.

Chippenham (Wilts).—The Chippenham Choral Society gave its seventh annual concert at the Neeld Hall, on February 14. The programme included Stanford's 'The Revenge' and miscellaneous numbers. The soloists were Miss Florence Heming and Mr. John Prout. Mr. W. R. Pullein conducted.

Christchurch (N.Z.)—A carefully prepared and inspiring performance of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' was given by the Musical Union on December 19, under the able direction of Dr. Bradshaw. The soloists of the concert were Mrs. Gower Burns, who was heard in 'Hear my prayer,' Miss Lezard, and Mr. Stephens.

Crowborough.—On January 16 and 17, the Crowborough and Jarvis Brook Musical Society, under the popular conductorship of Herr E. Grimm, gave very enjoyable performances of 'Judas Maccabæus.' Marked improvement was noticed in the work of both choir and orchestra, and the music was listened to on both nights by a large and appreciative audience. The solos were sung by Miss Hoare and Messrs. E. Kellett and R. E. Miles.

Culham.—An excellent concert was given by the Culham College Choral and Orchestral Societies on February 19, before a large and enthusiastic audience. Gluck's 'Iphigenia in Aulis' Overture and Mozart's Symphony in G major were played by the orchestra of fifty, led by Mr. W. J. Toms, who gave also a finished rendering of the Rondo and Andantino from de Bèriot's eighth Concerto. The Choral Society sang with considerable taste and skill a number of part-songs and choruses. These included 'Where lies the land?' (Rogers), 'What care I?' (Blumenthal), 'In this hour of softened splendour' (Pinsuti), and 'Song of the Vineyard' (de Rillé). The Rev. A. S. Arrowsmith, musical director of the College, conducted with his customary ability.

Dundee.—A successful performance of Berlioz's 'Faust' was given by the Amateur Choral Union on February 14. The soloists were Miss Emily Breare, Mr. Maurice D'Oisly, Mr. Charles Knowles, and Mr. Philip Malcolm. A professional orchestra of forty-five, under the leadership of Mr. W. H. Cole, of Glasgow, ably performed the exacting accompaniments. Mr. Charles M. Cowe conducted.

Egremont.—Macfarren's melodious cantata, 'May-Day' and Dr. Walford Davies's stirring 'Hervé Riel' formed an excellent choice of music for the concert given by the St. John's Choral Society on January 29 and highly attractive performances were given under the direction of Mr. W. Biller. The principals were Mrs. Robert Walker and Mr. Samuel Mann. The programme included also Lee Williams's 'Song of the Pedlar.'

Enniscorthy.—The Choral Union chose Cowen's 'St. John's Eve' for their first concert of the season, which took place on February 1. Mr. Challans conducted a spirited and agreeable performance, in which the honours were shared by choir, orchestra and principals. The latter were Miss H. Preston, Mrs. Arnold, the Rev. J. R. Barker, and Mr. F. Rayne.

Farnborough.—Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' was sung by the Choral Society with excellent choral efficiency, under the direction of Mr. G. A. Stanton, on February 7. The soloists were Miss Marion Perrott, Miss Fanny Stapley, Mr. Douglas Boorman, and Mr. Jackson Potter.

Gainsborough.—The fifty-first annual concert of the Gainsborough Choral Society took place on February 14, when the programme included MacCunn's 'Lay of the last Minstrel, Ambroise Thomas's 'Raymond' Overture, and solos contributed by Miss Nellie Judson, Miss Amy Dewhurst, Mr. Charles Nicholson, and Mr. Robert Charlesworth. Some attractive choral singing was secured by Mr. W. A. Montgomery, the conductor.

Hastings.—At All Souls' Church on January 24, a performance of Handel's 'Messiah' was given by Mr. Edward Kennard's Ore and Clive Vale Harmonic Society. The soloists were Miss Florence Mellors, Lady Maud Warrender, Mr. G. W. Foxon and Mr. R. H. Abraham. Mr. Henry Poole was the organist, and Mr. Edward Kennard, organist and choirmaster, conducted.

Hawarden.—On February 13, the second provincial performance of 'A tale of Old Japan,' Coleridge-Taylor's new choral work, was given by the County School Choir, in conjunction with the Hawarden and District Male-Voice Choir, a combination which produced an exceptionally fine mixed choir. The choral parts of the work were extremely well rendered, and its beauties were enthusiastically appreciated by a crowded audience. Miss Edith McCullagh gave an inspiring performance of the part of little O Kimi San, while the rôles of Sawara and Yoichi Tenko were very ably taken by Messrs. J. J. Maltby and H. Bairstow. An orchestra, mainly from Liverpool, played the picturesque accompaniments very capably, while Mr. Arthur Lyon, the headmaster of the County School, conducted. The work made a very deep impression on all present.

Hightown (Liversedge).—A recital of English Church music by Sir George Martin was given by the Hightown Wesleyan Choir on February 11. In the anthem 'Hail, gladdening Light,' the accompaniment of cornets and trombone, along with the organ, was most effective. Mr. Robert Charlesworth sang three solos with great acceptance, and with Miss Jennie Halmshaw was responsible for the solo and duet work. Mr. Arthur Firth accompanied on the organ with excellent judgment and taste, and played Bach's Toccata in C major and Driffill's Suite in F minor. The choir, under the direction of Mr. Frank Sharp, sang throughout in a manner which showed the most careful attention to detail, and the result was well worthy of commendation.

Horsham.—Under the direction of Mr. G. F. Brockless the Musical Society gave a well chosen and interesting programme at the King's Head Assembly Room on January 25. Coleridge-Taylor's neglected but attractive cantata, 'The blind girl of Castél Cuillé' was the principal work, and being adequately performed, it made a good impression. Stanford's 'The Revenge' and the chorus, 'I am the god Thor,' from Elgar's 'King Olaf,' gave the choralists a chance of showing their capabilities in sturdier music. An orchestra accompanied and played Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite as an independent contribution. The soloists of the concert were Miss Nellie Evans, Miss Lily Fairney and Master Eric Bates.

Hythe.—The Choral Society gave the second concert of their ninth season on January 25. The programme consisted of 'Gallia' (Gounod), 'The Black Knight' (Elgar), and 'Preciosa' (Weber). Miss Elizabeth Hyde was the solo vocalist, the principal first violin was Miss Mary Noverre, and Dr. A. T. Froggatt conducted.

Leighton Buzzard.—The Musical Society gave an excellent performance of Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' on February 8. The choir, admirably trained by the hon. conductor, Mr. R. Richardson Jones, frequently evoked the approval of the large audience by the all-round merit of its work. Particularly was this the case with the unaccompanied anthem, 'O gladsome Light.' The soloists were Miss Rhoda Whyley, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Henry Beaumont and Mr. Charles Tree. The latter gentleman sang with great dramatic ability as Lucifer, and quite justified his high reputation. Miss Maud Wright sang with much power and feeling, and Mr. Henry Beaumont did extremely well. The orchestra, augmented by a number of well-known London instrumentalists and some members of the band of the Royal Marines (Chatham), was on the whole very efficient indeed.

Lowestoft.—The first concert of the newly-formed Musical Society was given on February 6, at the Swimming Baths, to a large and appreciative audience. Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' occupied the first part of the programme. The soloists were Miss C. Furness, Miss M. Curnow, Mr. A. E. Benson, and Mr. Vincent Jones—the latter created an excellent impression at his first appearance in Lowestoft. The choir and orchestra (numbering 120) gave evidence of careful training under Mr. W. J. Wightman, who conducted, and were particularly successful in the final chorus, 'In sempiterna.' The miscellaneous second part included the Overture to 'Raymond,' by the orchestra, the Miserere Scene from 'Il Trovatore,' by Miss L. White and Mr. Benson, 'Hail, bright abode,' from 'Tannhäuser,' and some unaccompanied part-songs.

Ludlow.—The Choral Society performed a selection from 'Judas Maccabæus' on February 6, under the conductorship of Mr. H. C. L. Stocks. The soloists (who also contributed songs in the second part of the programme) were Madame Sadler Fogg, Miss Connie Mason, Mr. A. Wilkes and Mr. W. Bradford. The leader of the orchestra was Mr. J. W. Austin.

Milford-on-Sea.—The Choral Society gave a Madrigal Concert on January 31. The programme contained seven madrigals, by Dowland, Luca Marenzio, Wilbye, and John Farmer. A Trio from Mozart's 'Magic Flute' was sung by trebles selected from the choir of the Parish Church, and trained by Mr. W. R. Beesley, the choirmaster. The second part of the programme consisted of items from the works of Richard Wagner, amongst them being the 'Spinning Chorus' and 'Sailors' Chorus' from the 'Flying Dutchman' and the 'Bridal Chorus' from 'Lohengrin.' Miss Madge Bruce accompanied on the pianoforte, and played two of MacDowell's 'Sea-pieces' with excellent effect, besides giving such a spirited rendering of the march in 'Tannhäuser' as to earn an 'encore.' A somewhat novel feature in this concert was the successful performance of two solos on the trumpet by Mr. E. Knight, a local amateur. The conductor was Mr. C. F. Abdy Williams.

North Walsham.—The Amateur Musical Society gave two concerts on the afternoon and evening of February 14. The programme in the afternoon included Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' and Elgar's 'Banner of St. George,' and that in the evening Mendelssohn's 'Athalie' and a repetition of Elgar's cantata. There was a small but efficient orchestra, led by Mr. W. Gemmer, and the choruses were sung with much spirit under the direction of Mr. A. S. Wilde. The solo parts were sung by Miss Margaret Layton (an excellent soprano), Miss G. E. Crotch, and Miss L. Burton. Mr. Charles Fry was once more responsible for the descriptive lines in 'Athalie,' besides contributing other items with much success.

Porth. — A musical event of unusual importance occurred on February 8, when Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' was performed by the Bethlehem Choral Society, under the able direction of Mr. W. Howell. The choral singing was notable for its fine tone and earnestness of expression. The principals were Miss May John, Miss Winifred Lewis, Mr. John Roberts and Mr. Ivor Foster.

Princes Risborough.—The Saunderton and District Choral Society held their first concert in the Hall, Princes Risborough, on January 17, under the conductorship of the Rev. Leonard Packer, Rector of Saunderton. The choral singing, much of which was unaccompanied, reflected great credit on both conductor and choir for its precision, delicacy, and correctness of pitch. The encouragement given to choral music by the Bucks, Berks and Oxon. Festival can reap no better reward than such intelligent and enthusiastic efforts on the part of individual districts in the three counties.

Sittingbourne.—The Sittingbourne and District Musical Society, now in its thirtieth season and still flourishing, gave a concert on January 24, at which Barnett's 'The Ancient Mariner' and Sterndale Bennett's 'The May Queen' were well performed under the direction of Mr. W. J. Keech. The principals were Miss Kathleen Peck, Miss Ruth Brandon, Mr. Albert Watson and Mr. Graham Smart.

Stoke-on-Trent.—A 'Festival Concert' was given on February 8 by the North Staffordshire Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. John Cope, and the North Staffordshire District Choral Society. The choir confined their attention to part-songs. The orchestra played the Vorspiel and Liebestod from 'Tristan,' and accompanied Miss Margaret Holloway in a creditable performance of Elgar's Violin concerto. Songs were given by Madame Kirkby Lunn.

Sydney.—'The Messiah' was performed twice by the Royal Philharmonic Society as a Christmas celebration, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Bradley. The choral singing was excellent in tone and breadth of expression. The feature of the occasion, however, was the presence of Mr. Ben Davies as tenor soloist. His colleagues were Miss Esta d'Argo, Miss Josie Miles, and Mr. A. K. Jamieson.

Tredegar.—Gade's 'The Crusaders' was very creditably performed on February 8 by the Seion Philharmonic Society of 200 voices, under the direction of Mr. Evan Jones. The choir made good use of the opportunities afforded for expressive and dramatic singing, and showed a good technical grasp of the music. Good work was done by the baritone soloist, Mr. Bridge Peters. The other soloists engaged were Miss Gertrude Blomfield and Mr. Sam Hempsall.

Ventnor.—The performance of 'The Messiah,' given by the Musical Society on January 24, was one of the most successful events in the Society's career. This outcome was due to Mr. Evan Jones's able training and conducting, and the responsiveness of the singers. The principals were Miss Elizabeth Hyde, Miss Lily Fairney, Mr. Ernest Osborne, and Mr. Gordon Yates.

Wakefield.—A successful vocal recital was given on January 23, by Miss Edith Lofthouse, who was assisted by Mr. Austin Mahony and Mr. Richard Wilson (vocalists), and Miss Ella Child (pianist).

Winchester.—The Choral Society has emerged with added vigour from its troublous times, and revealed its new spirit on February 1, in an excellent performance of Cowen's 'St. John's Eve,' under the able direction of Mr. Gamblin. A high level of efficiency and expressiveness was maintained by the singing of the choralists and by that of the soloists—Miss Marsden Owen, Miss Mary Williams, Mr. Douglas Boorman, and Mr. Reginald Stuart.

Foreign Notes.

BERLIN.

The young Australian pianist, Winifred Purnell, has given a second and very successful recital at the Bechstein Hall. The house was sold out a week before the performance.——Dr. Ernst Kunwald is retiring from the conductorship of the Philharmonic Orchestra on April 1.——The 'Verein für die Geschichte Berlins' gave a performance of the pastoral play 'Il rè pastore,' by Frederick the Great, on the occasion of the two-hundredth anniversary of his birth. This play was first performed in 1777 in the castle of Charlottenburg. It was written in honour of the Queen-mother Sophie Dorothea, and the King commanded Quantz, Graun and Nickelmann to set the arias and choruses, while he himself composed the two principal scenes.——Caruso states that he will sing Lohengrin for the first time at one of the five appearances he is making at the Opera next October.——Richard Strauss has signed a contract to conduct the symphony concerts and occasional performances at the Opera till September 1, 1913.——Eugen d'Albert's reappearance as solo pianist, with the Philharmonic Orchestra under Dr. Kunwald, was a great artistic triumph. He played Beethoven's Concertos in G and E flat, and Liszt's Concerto in E flat.——The Roumanian sixteen-year-old pianist, Nadia Chebap, had a great success at her first recital.——The five-act opera, 'Quo Vadis?' by Nouguès, was performed for the first time in Berlin at the Kurfürstenoper on February 17.

BREMEN.

At the sixth Philharmonic Concert, conducted by Ernst Wendel, Ysaye played Elgar's Violin concerto. As in Berlin, the success was enormous, though the critics voice widely-differing opinions. One hails the concerto as 'a strong and earnest work, the importance of which is evident in every bar, and before all containing much that is new.'

BRUNSWICK.

Richard Strauss's 'Elektra' has been produced here. This is the first opera by Strauss that has been given in Brunswick.

BRUSSELS.

The Festival performance of 'Fidelio' under Otto Lohse's direction was a noteworthy event. A new translation by Kufferath and Guidé was used, and the recitative added by Gevaert was omitted, the dialogue being spoken, as in the original.——The pianist Alice Jones has given a very successful recital, at which she played the 'Prelude, Aria and Finale' of César Franck.——A new opera in four acts entitled 'Rhena,' libretto by Michel Carré, music by Jean van den Eeden, was produced with great success at the Théâtre Royale de la Monnaie on February 15.

BUENOS AYRES.

Humperdinck's 'Königskinder' will be performed here in Italian during the spring, under Toscanini's direction.

CHICAGO.

The second season of the Chicago Opera Company concluded on Saturday, January 27, with a performance of Wolf-Ferrari's 'Jewels of the Madonna' in the afternoon, and 'The Secret of Susanne' (Wolf-Ferrari) and 'Pagliacci' in the evening. The season lasted ten weeks, and was the most successful ever given in Chicago. The gross receipts amounted to $463,000, or $63,000 more than last year. Among the operas performed, the following have obtained the most conspicuous success: 'The Juggler of Nôtre Dame' (Massenet), 'The Jewels of the Madonna,' 'The Secret of Susanne' (Wolf-Ferrari), and 'Natoma,' the new American-Indian opera by Victor Herbert.

COLOGNE.

The first part of the sixth Gürzenich concert was devoted to music by British composers. The works performed were Stanford's Prelude to his 'Stabat Mater,' Parry's Symphonic Variations, and songs by Elgar and Mallinson, sung by Madame Kirkby Lunn. Elgar had been invited to conduct his second Symphony, but was unable to accept the invitation.

COPENHAGEN.

A hitherto unknown Bach manuscript, occupying ten folio pages, is reported to have been found in the Royal Library by the German music-historian, Martiensen. It is a sacred cantata for soprano solo, with accompaniment for string quartet and oboe. The manuscript was originally in the possession of the Danish musician, Grönland.——Elgar's first Symphony is to be performed here twice, under the direction of Prof. Neruda, on March 5 and 16.

CREFELD.

The first performance of Otto Neitzel's opera, 'Die Barberina' (in three acts and an epilogue), on January 28 in the Stadttheater provided a small sensation. Immediately after the performance the police stepped in, and issued an order forbidding all repetitions of the work, the reason being that German law does not allow a Prussian king to be represented on the stage within two hundred years of his death. In this opera Frederick the Great appears as a mute character in a very favourable light. The prohibition has since been withdrawn, and it seems probable that the work will have a long life. The music is well written and tuneful, without being banal, and is free from Wagnerian influence. The libretto, written by the composer, is also very favourably spoken of.

DRESDEN.

The 'Meistersinger' has been given with entirely new scenery, made according to old plans and pictures of Nuremberg. —— Generalmusikdirektor von Schuch is engaged to conduct for six months in America next season.

FRANKFORT-ON-MAIN.

'Oberst Chabert,' a music tragedy by H. W. von Waltershausen, was very favourably received at its first performance on January 18. The composer is also the author of the libretto, which he has founded on a novel by Balzac. Throughout there is a strong sense of the dramatic, and the orchestration is so discreet that practically every word of the text can be heard and understood—a fact that makes this opera almost unique among modern operas.——A committee, presided over by Oberbürgermeister Adicke, is arranging a Festival of sacred music which is to take place on April 3, 4, and 5. On the first day Mahler's eighth Symphony will be performed; on the second there will be a matinée given by artists from Amsterdam; and on the third the 'St. Matthew' Passion will be sung. Mengelberg will conduct, and the forces under him consis of three orchestras, among them the Concertgebouw Orchestra from Amsterdam, two mixed choirs (one from Amsterdam), a boys' choir, and twelve vocal soloists. The Festival will be held in the Festhalle, a hall which can seat fifteen thousand people. There has been much discussion as to the suitability of this hall for the performance of such works as the Passion, but a circular which has been sent out by the Committee should dispel all doubts on the subject.

No. 44.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICAL COMPETITION & DEMONSTRATION FOR CHOIRS, ORCHESTRAS, & BANDS.

PARIS, MAY 26, 27 (WHIT-MONDAY), AND 28.

IN our last issue we gave all the particulars obtainable as to the three main Choral Divisions of this International event. We have now to describe the existing situation.

I.—THE CHORAL COMPETITIONS.

The entries closed on February 10, and on February 18 the order in which choirs are to compete, and the grouping, were decided by ballot at the Hôtel de Ville in the presence of a large gathering of delegates and other persons interested. Entries have been received from forty-one British choirs, with 2,813 singers. As was anticipated, the entries of the female-voice and mixed-voice classes are mainly British. The French choirs have entered in large numbers in the male-voice choir classes, but mostly in the lower divisions. We give on the next page a list of all the entries in classes in which British choirs have entered. 'Excellence' is the highest Division, the next is 'Superior,' and below that the classes are Division I., II., &c.

Each choir has to sing the stated test-piece and music of its own choice. The Paris Council provides the copies of the tests imposed free, and the choirs have to provide copies of their own-choice music.

All the music is now ready, and nearly all of it can be obtained in the tonic sol-fa notation.

II.—NON-COMPETITIVE SINGING.

Tuesday, May 28.—This section is open to any choir which may be formed for the occasion. There are no money-prizes, but trophies will be awarded. Each choir may choose its own programme, to last not more than thirty minutes. The pieces may be accompanied or not, but it will not be possible to arrange for orchestral accompaniment, if only because of the difficulty of adequate rehearsal. Entries need not be made before April 1.

III.—CHILDREN'S CHOIRS.

As announced in our last issue the Paris Committee very generously and cordially invites British school children to join the Paris children at the competition on Tuesday, May 28. Their first idea was to invite 1,000 children, but it is now doubtful whether accommodation can be provided for so great a number. Until this can be definitely ascertained the invitation is restricted to 500 children from the London County Council schools.

The matter has been before the L.C.C. Authorities, but no definite decision to accept the invitation had been made up to the time of our going to press. Mr. B. M. Allen, an officer of the L.C.C., has been in Paris on behalf of the Council to inquire into the proposed arrangements for the accommodation of the 500 children, and has reported to the Council. He has stated (to the Paris representative of the Daily Telegraph) that he is perfectly satisfied that the children will be well looked after and given comfortable quarters. He visited the Lycée Jean Baptiste, at Auteuil, where it is proposed to accommodate the boys. The girls will be provided for at Versailles at the Lycée des Jeunes Filles and at the Ecole Normale Institution.

The Daily Telegraph says that:

'The ground of the Lycée occupies some ten acres with large playgrounds and gardens. There are eight dormitories, capable of accommodating 250 pupils, and three refectories which can hold more than 500. The dormitories are about 60ft. long and more than 30ft. wide. The ceilings are high and the accommodation is modern. The director explained to me that it was not likely that they could accommodate all the boys at this establishment, but the Municipal Council still has at its disposal the dormitories of the Lycée Rollin and the Lycée Chaptal, and, if necessary, it will not be difficult to arrange for other accommodation with the State Lycées, some of which, like the Lycée Michelet, can take in 1,000 pupils. There is also easy communication between Auteuil and the Hôtel de Ville, and there is likely to be a special boat for the boys, who will thus have a pleasant ride on the Seine. The accommodation, in fine, is abundant, and anxious mothers, whose boys and girls are coming over for the first time to Paris, may rest assured that the City Fathers will treat them royally.

HUDDERSFIELD.—February 9, 10.

(Mrs. Sunderland Competitions.)

Some interesting contests took place in the course of these meetings. Morley Vocal Union (Mr. S. Smith) were again successful in the male-voice section, and Armley Choral Society (Mr. H. H. Pickard) in the mixed-voice section. Five excellent school choirs entered, and Golcar Knowl Bank (Mr. J. Griffiths) deserve special credit for beating their rivals. The violin-solo class was made specially interesting by the choice of the Finale from Mendelssohn's Concerto as a test; the performances, of which Miss Winnie Butterworth's was the best, were surprisingly good. The other solo prize-winners were Miss Dorothy G. Spooner (sopranos), Mr. George Ould (basses), and Harry Shackleton (choir boys). Dr. Roland Rogers adjudicated.

CARLISLE.—February 14, 15, 16.

Except in the instrumental classes, this Festival was a great success. The tests were well chosen, and the competitions were well supported by choirs and public. The adjudicator throughout was Mr. Harry Evans.

As usual this neighbourhood produced some of the finest children's choral singing that has been heard. The performances with which Bishop Goodwin Memorial Boys' School (Mr. W. H. Reid) won the two chief challenge shields and the prize for staff-notation sight-singing were so described by Mr. Harry Evans. In all three competitions this choir was closely pressed by Brook Street Girls' School (Miss E. Irving), who won the second prizes. In other junior classes the premier positions were won by Spelter Works School (Mr. T. W. Young), Upperby G.F.S. (Miss A. Mann), Holy Trinity Choristers (Mr. J. K. Kirkbride).

In a class for business choirs, Carr Works Society (Mr. W. C. Darley) were successful against four other competitors.

The competition for village choral societies attracted eight entries. The test was Pinsuti's 'Rhine raft song,' and the prize went to Mosser Singing Class.

In the three classes for church and chapel choirs, St. James's, Scotby Church, and Upperby St. John-the-Baptist won the first places.

The tests and results in the chief choral competitions were as follow:

Female-Voice Choirs.

(Eight entries.)

Tests: 'From the green heart of the waters' (Coleridge-Taylor).
'Now all the roses are blooming.'

1st. Lowther Choir, Carlisle (Mr. W. C. Darley).
2nd. Triphena, Penrith (Miss M. E. Thompson).

Male-Voice Choirs.

Tests: 'Polish tavern song' (Stehle).
'I dare not ask a kiss' (Bairstow).

1st. Carlisle Glee Union.
2nd. Aspatria.

Choral Societies (under 40 voices).

Tests: 'Sweet day so cool' (Parry).
'In these delightful, pleasant groves' (Purcell).

1st. Aspatria Choral School (Mr. James Cobb).

Choral Societies (under 50 voices).

Tests: 'Adieu, sweet Amaryllis' (Wilbye).
'Dim-lit woods' (Brahms).
'Blow, blow, thou winter wind' (Wood).

1st. Carlisle Choral Society (Mr. W. H. Reid).
2nd. Carlisle Madrigal Society (Mr. J. R. Cockbain).
3rd. Orpheus (Mr. Isaac Byers).

BURY.—February 15, 16, 17.

I had the honour of adjudicating at the first two Festivals held in this town in 1906 and 1907. It was interesting and very gratifying to compare the general results of this year's event with my memories of the former Festivals. The advance made in almost every department was marked, and most so in the solo-singing and choral sections. The music was well chosen, and its quality served to show that the Selection Committee has an educated musical conscience. The vast Drill Hall, in which the chief classes were heard, was often well filled during the three days (9.30 a.m. to about 10 p.m., with intervals for meals). The 1912 Festival provides a very good object-lesson in the educational value of the Festival movement.

W. G. McN.

Below we give some of the principal results in the choral classes. We regret we cannot find space for other results. The adjudicators were Dr. McNaught, Mr. Carl Fuchs, and Mr. H. Whittaker:

Children's Choirs.

First prizes were won by the following:

Sight and Ear-Test.

Ramsbottom Junior Orpheus.

Action-Songs.

(Under 14) Bank Street S.S. (Dr. W. Rigby); (under 7) Peel Brow Infant School (Miss B. Hartley).

Choirs of Children (under 14).

Tottington Wesleyan (Miss Florrie Holding.

Choirs of Children (under 17).

Castlecroft School (Mr. Stanley Spencer).

In a class for G.F.S. choirs, St. Mark's (Miss Helen Walker) were successful. The open female-voice choir competition was won by Salford Vocal Society (Mr. F. W. Blacow). In the two mixed-voice classes only choirs from churches and chapels were invited. Bank Street Unitarian S.S. (Dr. W. Rigby) were first in the less advanced section. The tests, entries, and results in the higher mixed-voice and male-voice sections were the following:

Male-Voice Choirs.

Tests: 'Boot and saddle' (Bantock).
'Hymn before action' (Walford Davies).

1st. Accrington and Church Co-operative (Mr. E. Whittaker).
Littleborough Male Glee Club (Mr. T. M. Robinson).
2nd. Salford (Mr. David Grundy).
St. Mark's Men's Guild, Bury (Mr. J. E. Ford).

Church and Chapel Choirs.

Tests: 'Emer's lament for Cuchulain' (Bantock).
'Now sinks the sun' (H. W. Parker).

*2nd. Presbyterian Chapel, Bank Street (Dr. William Rigby).
1st. Radcliffe Bridge Wesleyan (Mr. E. Barnes).
*2nd. Stand Independent Church (Mr. F. W. Clay).
Lumb Baptist Choir (Mr. J. Parkinson).
Altrincham P.M. (Mr. J. A. Hill).

* Equal 2nd.

THE BLACKPOOL FESTIVAL, 1911.

OFFICIAL REPORT.

The official list of awards given at the above Festival, with the adjudicators' notes in full, has just been published in a substantial pamphlet of 80 pages (to be obtained from the Secretary, Musical Festival, Blackpool, post free, 9*d.*). As the Festival occupied five full days, and involved the employment of ten adjudicators, the report is a very elaborate one and affords evidence of the extraordinary influence of the event. We give extracts from the remarks of some of the adjudicators:

Dr. McNaught: 'A general survey of the whole field of the 1911 Festival justifies the conclusion that it was one of the most useful and successful of the series. Five thousand or more competitors came before its searchlight. There were thrilling moments of splendid efficiency, and there was mediocrity to tolerate and, if possible, to help to better things. This capture of the relatively inefficient is more to the glory of the movement than even the revelation of the efficient. There ought to be all grades in such a comprehensive school. The children's day was, as usual, a pleasurable experience. Such achievements in a pregnant educational direction would alone warrant the existence of the Festival. Perhaps the most important lesson to be learned in connection with the event is that, whether in solo singing or collective performance, over- or lopsided-cultivation tends to destroy the objective of its aim. The most beautiful and convincing performances were those achieved through naturalness and sincerity and obvious interest and enjoyment of the thing done. We conjure our adult solo singers to sing naturally viâ technique. But here in the children's solo classes we have the mystery often repeated of a young girl who comes forward and makes such an appeal as regards tone, temperament, and other qualities sought for in training, that judgment is almost paralysed and technical considerations seem petty and pedantic. The Challenge Trophy Male-Voice Class brought forward an unbeautiful piece by Richard Strauss—I am not objecting to the choice of the piece as a test, for it is well for us to know all schools—and a very original piece by Granville Bantock, "Lucifer in Starlight." I confess that a fairly close study of this remarkable composition beforehand made me dubious as to its feasibility and the effect of some of the novel features of its construction. But, once again at a competition, the apparently impossible was achieved, and we were all amazed at the splendid technique of the execution and the insight of the interpretation exhibited. In this connection it was gratifying to note that fine choral execution is so widespread in the country. That Worcestershire (Stourbridge) and Yorkshire (Halifax) wrested shields from Lancashire makes me harbour the thought that possibly some day the miracle of a choir from "somewhere farther south" may accomplish what a Leyton (London, E.) juvenile choir did in their class in 1910, and win the coveted trophy.'

Mr. ERNEST NEWMAN: 'It seemed to me that there is an ever-present danger of the choirs becoming a trifle mechanical through too much regard for the dynamic markings of their music. If there is to be a contrast of soft and loud, for example, or fast and slow, each choir knows that every choir will make the most of this, and so each choir tends to make too much of it. "Points" of this kind are literally hurled at the judges' heads—shot out of a cannon at them. It all makes for a certain mechanism in the singing; sometimes we can't see the wood for the trees. Is there no way of assuring the choirs that if, in accordance with their own idea of a passage they make a little more or a little less of a given marking than their competitors do, it will not tell against them so long as the general effect is fine? I don't recommend giving the choirs unmarked music. I simply plead for greater freedom of interpretation with regard to the markings, and for an assurance to the choirs that they will not be penalised for some slight modification of these so long as they make the music expressive. After all, the markings exist for the sake of the music, not the music for the markings.'

DR. BREWER: 'In the wide range of music chosen for performance, the Committee showed much broadmindedness, and set an example to other Competitive Festivals. With such high ideals before them, I hope the Festival Committee will eventually do for orchestral music what they have already done for choral music in the North. I was greatly impressed with the extraordinarily high level reached by the players, and it was difficult, in one instance, to realise that one was listening to a body of amateurs. I feel sure you would be doing a still greater work if a class could be arranged for solo wind instruments at your next Festival.'

Mr. FREDERIC AUSTIN: 'Attention should also be drawn to the increasing significance of the words in all modern vocal music. To carry the rendering of such music to the highest point, it is necessary, more now than at any previous period, to combine beauty of tone with absolute clearness of the word and truth of its emotional colour. This can only be done when the voice possesses its natural freedom and consequent elastic balance of tone; for clearness and truth of words is primarily clearness and flexibility of vowel-sounds. In seeking this combination of tone and vowel is found the clue to true production.'

Mr. J. FRANCIS HARFORD: Foreign Languages.—'There was one small upward tendency here—in that the study made for clearer diction. However, as has been already pointed out, one wants to use the original tongue as a better means of discovering the hidden meanings of both author and composer—much of which is often lost in the process of translation.'

Mr. PAUL LE VALLON: 'On the whole there is no doubt that plenty of good material exists; but there is also much evidence that the study of singing is not taken seriously enough in this country. There are at least two reasons for this: (1.) The average students, living in the provinces at any rate, have such rare opportunities of hearing the really best artists, that they do not realise the enormous chasm—a chasm only bridged over by years of strenuous and often bitter toil—which separates the first-class artist from the semi-professional. (2.) The strong commercial instinct (prevalent in the North more especially) which leads the majority of students to accept engagements before they are really fit to do so. The greater number, even during their short period of study, content themselves (or have to be content) with one short lesson per week. A good professor in Italy would expect the student to have an hour's lesson every day. Hinc illæ lachrymæ!'

Mr. CHAS. H. FOGG: 'Two strong points impressed me in the pianoforte classes: the great advance made in getting a right touch—not one of the young children could be charged with thumping—and more particularly the sight-reading, which, in many of the competitors, did not end in reading notes only, but in giving expression and interpretation to the music. This I had asked for.'

Mr. CHARLES RISEGARI: 'In Class 18, in which the solos were—(a) "Warum" and (b) "Grillen" (Schumann)—the chief fault was, of course, the lack of instinct to present these little tone-poems in their proper moods. Several competitors were successful in portraying the right spirit in one or the other of the two; but the test from the point of view of the diversity of the moods of the two pieces was undoubtedly a difficult one, and it was pleasing to hear so many do so very creditably. In Class 19—"Consolation in D flat" (Liszt)—the result was rather disappointing: for the simple rhythmical device of two notes against three, and three against four, seemed to be a serious difficulty to so many. After this disappointment, however, the pleasure of hearing the prize-winners was a real gratification.'

THE BARROW CHOIR LONDON CONCERT.

In our issue for December, 1911, we gave an account of the exploits of the above Choir, and a portrait of the conductor, Mrs. Bourne. We are glad to be able to announce that the Choir will appear at the Broadwood Concert, to be given at the Æolian Hall, New Bond Street, on Thursday, March 7, at 8.30. A fine selection of Madrigals and part-music (all unaccompanied) will be performed. Lovers of part-singing should not miss this exceptional opportunity.

DATES OF COMPETITIONS AND NAMES OF SECRETARIES.

GOTHA.

'The Rosenkavalier' has been given here for the first time, under the direction of Hofkapellmeister Lorenz.

HAMBURG.

Busoni's opera 'Die Brautwahl' will be produced here in April.——Weingartner has been appointed principal conductor and artistic adviser to the Hamburg and Altona theatres.

HILDESHEIM.

While searching the archives of the church of St. André, the organist has discovered among numerous musical manuscripts several cantatas and motets by Heinrich Schütz, who died at Dresden in 1672.

KAISERSLAUTERN.

Kapellmeister Alfred Thiemann has started a series of symphony concerts. The orchestra has been strengthened to fifty men, and the chief item in the first concert was the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz.

KÖNIGSBERG.

On January 13, Ysaye played Elgar's Violin concerto with great success at one of the symphony concerts, under the direction of Prof. Max Brode.

LEIPSIC.

At the fourteenth Gewandhaus Concert Maximilian Schwedler played the slow movement from a Flute concerto in C major by Frederick the Great, to commemorate the two-hundredth anniversary of his birth.

MAINZ.

Granville Bantock's symphonic poem 'Dante and Beatrice' was played here for the first time at the eighth symphony concert under the direction of Kapellmeister Gorter, and was well received.

MILAN.

On January 20, Mascagni's new opera 'Isabeau' was produced simultaneously in Milan and Venice and made a great success. The first German performance will probably take place at the Munich Hofoper.

MUNICH.

Humperdinck's 'Königskinder' has been produced here with great success.——On January 29, Elgar's second Symphony was played at a concert of the Konzertverein under Kapellmeister Löwe's direction. We quote the following remarks from the Augsburger Abendzeitung: 'This Symphony shows that in Elgar England's musical spirit is stirring strongly, and that England is gradually leaving behind the barren years that for centuries have held her, once a leader in musical art, in chains of bondage.'

NANCY.

'Le Pays,' a new opera in three acts by M. Guy Ropartz, libretto by Ch. de Goffic, was produced here early in February and favourably received.

PARIS.

A new Symphony (No. 2) by M. Witkowski has been produced at a Lamoureux Concert.——On January 16 a Society with the title 'Salon des musiciens français' was inaugurated. Among the members of the committee are Debussy, G. Hüe, Vidal, Dukas, and Madame Chaminade. One of the chief objects of the Society is to make known unpublished works.——On January 17, Vernon Warner gave a very successful pianoforte recital at the Salle Erard.——At the Salle des Agriculteurs, on January 16, Edith Smeraldina gave a violin recital with great success.——A dramatic opera with the title 'La Lépreuse,' libretto by Henri Bataille, music by Silvio Lazzari, has been produced at the Opéra-Comique. The libretto is so uninviting that the work is not likely to become widely known, in spite of the excellent music, which at times succeeds in ennobling a very sordid subject.——Arnold Schönberg, the most modern of all modern composers, is to be heard in Paris. In March the 'Lejeune' Quartet will give a 'Schönberg' concert, and the 'Société Independante de Musique,' founded by Debussy, will give the first performance of five new pieces for orchestra, conducted by the composer.

PILSEN.

Dvorák's 'St. Ludmila' is to be performed here on March 23.

PRAGUE.

Kienzl's opera 'Der Kuhreigen' has been produced at the Neues Deutscher Theater under the direction of Kapellmeister Zemlinsky, with great success.

ROME.

The committee engaged in collating Verdi's correspondence, which is to be published next year, the hundreth anniversary of his birth, has discovered at the villa Santa Agata, where Verdi spent most of his life, the complete overture to 'Aïda.' The existence of this overture has been questioned, although it was said that the composer had withdrawn it after the final rehearsal for the first performance, as he was not satisfied with it.——The first performance of Richard Strauss's 'Elektra,' under the direction of Vitali, made a deep impression.

SCHWERIN.

A Festival of French music is to be given here next October.

STUTTGART.

The Württembergische Bachverein is arranging a Bach Festival to take place from June 1 to 3. Two choirs, numbering together 800 singers, and the Hoftheater orchestra will take part. Generalmusikdirektor Max Schillings and Hofkapellmeister Band will conduct.

TÜBINGEN.

A three days' Bach Festival was given here on January 30 to February 2, under the direction of Prof. Dr. Fritz Volbach, to whose initiative and energy the whole scheme was due.

VIENNA.

The Municipal Council of Vienna has decided to acquire for the Historical Museum a bust of Haydn which originally belonged to the composer himself.——d'Albert's new comic opera 'Die verschenkte Frau' was produced, and very well received, on February 6 at the Hoftheater.——At his second recital, on February 5, Fritz Kreisler played, with the Tonkünstlerorchester under Nedbal, Elgar's Violin concerto, with which he had a great success.——Elgar's second Symphony has been played here for the first time at a concert of the Konzertverein, under the direction of Ferdinand Löwe. A critic in the Neues Wiener Tageblatt refers to it as 'perhaps the most important production of recent times, certainly one of the most interesting.'——Elgar's 'The Apostles' is to be performed here on March 31 by the Sängerbund 'Dreizehnlinden,' under the direction of Ferdinand Habel.——Granville Bantock's 'Omar Khàyyam' was performed here by the 'Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde' on February 14, under the conductorship of Franz Schalk. The house was crowded, and the success of the work was unqualified. The German re-translation of Fitzgerald's translation is by Karl Lafite, secretary-general of the Society. The soloists were Fräulein Flore Kalbeck, Herr Rudolf Ritter (tenor) and Herr Thomas Denys (from Amsterdam) baritone.

Miscellaneous.

The following have been awarded scholarships at Trinity College of Music for one year with possible renewal: William Harold Bowyer and Harold Arthur Wood (pianoforte). Gladys Laura Jones, Florence Clarice Mills and Augusta Theresa Tromp (singing). Hazel Blanche Giles and Samuel Kutcher (violin).

It is announced that the Mendelssohn Scholarship is about to become vacant. The following particulars have been supplied:—Musical students of either sex, between the ages of 16 and 22, being single, and natives of, or domiciled in, Great Britain or Ireland, are eligible. The qualification for election is a decided talent for music, exhibited in composition. The scholars are elected, after examination, for the period of one year, subject to renewal. No person, however, can hold a scholarship for more than four years; nor after having been married, without the previous sanction of the committee. The education of the scholars is carried on, in this country or abroad, under the control of the committee. The candidates' claims are judged by inspection of specimens of composition, not exceeding three, from each candidate and by viva voce examination. Certificates of birth, testimonials, and compositions, with the examination fee of one guinea, must be sent on or before May 1, to the hon. sec., 1, New Court, Carey Street, London, W.C.

Apropos the 'Occasional Note' in our last issue relative to the excellent work carried on by the Oxford House Dramatic and Musical Association, we note that Mr. Charles Fry gave his one hundredth Shakespearean costume recital in Excelsior Hall recently. At the conclusion of the performance the head of Oxford House addressed the audience, congratulating Mr. Fry on the success of his Shakespearean mission at the East-End. Subsequently Mr. Fry was presented by the members of his company with a handsome silver cigar casket, suitably inscribed with the names of the twenty-three plays which had been performed before overflowing audiences in the hall.

The Earl of Plymouth has given his patronage to a concert to be given at the Crystal Palace on Wednesday, June 19, by the Festival of Empire Girls' Choir. The choir is formed of girls from the higher-class schools of London, and is conducted by Mr. S. Filmer Rook. The proceeds of the concert will be given to the Earl of Plymouth's Fund for the purchase of the Crystal Palace. All inquiries in relation to the concert should be addressed to Mr. Granville Humphreys, 85 Elms Road, Clapham, S.W.

We hear that Mr. Charles Manners's production of 'Elijah' as an opera, at Liverpool, on February 21, was a great success. We regret that we cannot report it this month.

On February 12 a presentation, taking the form of a writing-desk, was made to Mr. William Johnson, who for eighteen years has conducted the Leytonstone Glee Union.

'The structure and arrangement of concert halls' was the subject of a lecture delivered by Mr. H. Heathcote Statham at a meeting of the Musical Association on February 20.

For the ninth consecutive year all the candidates from York Minster Choir School entering the musical theory examinations at Trinity College of Music have been successful.

Messrs. J. B. Cramer & Co., Ltd., the well-known pianoforte manufacturers, have removed their West-End establishment from Oxford Street to 139, New Bond Street, W.

We regret to hear that Miss Edyth Walker is seriously indisposed, and has been compelled to cancel all her engagements.

We are glad to hear that Herr Humperdinck is making satisfactory, if slow, progress towards complete recovery.

Answers to Correspondents.

C. E. J.—The metronome rate of the crotchet is constant at the change from four-four to three-two time in Dr. Walford Davies's 'Cradle Song' (No. 815, Novello's School Songs). The change is simply an alteration of the accent from two groups of two's into three groups of two's. If three beats in a bar at the same rate as four of the preceding bar had been wanted, the signature 'three-four' would have been used.

Faust.—We do not think that clarinet-playing will necessarily interfere with your voice qualities. Your experience as a singer may very well help you to phrase properly in playing the instrument.

Debussyite.—'Whole-tone' scale is decidedly the better term, as it implies a scale of whole-tones. The indefinite word 'tonal' has been extensively used, but seems to have died out.

J. Wood.—We have not yet traced the vocal duet, with English words, based upon the 'Blue Danube' Waltz. Perhaps some of our readers could help us.

Remarkable Work
ON
MUSIC EDUCATION.
Written by Famous Experts.

THAT Wonderful Book, the MUSICAL EDUCATOR, seems this season to be entering upon a new lease of life. As our readers know, its aim is to supply in interesting form a complete and systematic musical education.

We would especially draw attention to the following names of Leaders in the Musical World, and of the subjects for which they are responsible. The practical value of these sections will be apparent to all students and professors of music and singing.

MARK HAMBOURG,
"The Piano and how to Play it."
EDWIN H. LEMARE,
"The Art of Organ Playing."
MADAME MARCHESI,
"The Teaching of Singing."
JOHN DUNN,
"On Playing the Violin."
SIR F. H. COWEN,
"The Art of Conducting."

Course of Voice Training, Singing, and Solfeggio. Course on the Pianoforte. Course on the Violin. Positions illustrated by Diagrams and Photographs. Course on Harmonium, American Organ, and on the Organ. Lessons on Scientific Basis of Music. Lessons on Rudiments of Music. Course on Harmony and Counterpoint. Lessons in Canon and Fugue. Lessons in Musical Forms, Musical Analysis and Composition. Dictionary of Musical Terms. Articles on the Instruments used in the Orchestras and in Military Bands. History of Music. Biographical Dictionary of Musicians. Articles on Children's Music and Musical Drill. Articles on Choir Training and Conducting. Article on Congregational Music. Article on Musical Degrees and Education. Article on Nationality in Music.

Its Value to the Teacher.

In "The Musical Educator" every section is dealt with by an expert. Its value to the teacher of music is obvious, because it shows the way—at once simple and lucid—in which some of the greatest of musical professors would set about the instruction of a pupil anxious to perfect himself in his particular department, whether it be that of the piano, the violin, the harp, or any other instrument, or of any department of singing.

Add to this its all-round value as a standard work of reference on every point concerning the wide domain of music and musicians, and it will be granted that "The Musical Educator" is unique as well as complete.

TWO OPINIONS.

Sir J. FREDERICK BRIDGE.
"'The Musical Educator' is full of useful information plainly set forth. The musical illustrations are excellent."

Dr. CRESER, Mus.D. Oxon, F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L.
(Examiner in Music at Trinity College), writes:—
"We have here an illuminative work of great value, not only to the student, but also to the general reader. . . . It contains excellent instructions."

FREE INQUIRY.
TO THE CAXTON PUBLISHING CO., LTD.,
140, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, free of charge, and without any obligation on my part, your illustrated booklet on "The Musical Educator," and particulars of your plan by which the five volumes are delivered for a first payment of 1s. 6d., the balance being paid by a few small monthly payments.

"Gounod's 'Redemption' appeals to the public largely on account of the words with which the music is associated, and the same can certainly be said of 'The Messiah.' In each case the music, however, is undoubtedly a powerful factor, and the words being not only impressive, but also familiar, the listener is doubly affected. . . . Then, to speak only of Gounod's work, it is strong because it is sincere. A gifted composer, by thoughtful and deep study of the sacred story, can illustrate it in tones effectively, but more convincingly if in true sympathy with the subject—in other words, if he be religious, using that term in its widest sense. And Gounod, like Bach, and in modern times Liszt, was of a serious cast of mind, and possessor, moreover, of a strongly emotional nature."—Daily Telegraph, March 1, 1909.

"If allowances are made for the state of popular musical thought in his day, and for the undoubted sincerity with which Gounod adopted a style that suited his nature, it is possible to consider his 'Redemption' in many respects a work of high art. Melody in itself, if dissociated from unsuitable surroundings, will never fail to appeal, and broad choral effect, when secured by skilful methods, will always give pleasure. The audience that gathered on Saturday evening to hear the 'Redemption' performed by the Alexandra Palace Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill, showed by their number and their interested attention that the work still retains its hold."—Morning Post, March 1, 1909.

(* Performed by the Queen's Hall Orchestra.)

(†Performed by the Queen's Hall and Beecham Orchestras.)

Daily Telegraph.—"The crowded hour of glorious life has come to Mr. Josef Holbrooke far earlier in his career than he, perhaps, had any right to expect, and certainly—we state it frankly—far earlier than we thought he would enjoy it, for last night, at the penultimate Promenade Concert in the Queen's Hall he achieved, by means of his first Symphony, "Les Hommages," something that can only be described as a popular triumph.

"Where Mr. Holbrooke spoke for himself in the two middle movements, a charming Serenade and an Elegy of remarkable atmospheric beauty, he spoke as he has never spoken before, for here is the warmth of colour, and the refined delicacy of treatment. The finale, a brilliant piece of writing, largely fugal, in the tune of "Danse Russe," has without any doubt whatever raised its composer to a great height among his contemporaries. The Symphony was magnificently played under Sir Henry J. Wood, and there is no question whatever of its success."

"THE RAVEN" (FEB. 12, 1912).

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA (QUEEN'S HALL).

The Globe.—"It is an extremely clever work, the themes are vividly expressive."

The Standard.—"Both from an æsthetic and technical aspect this tone picture is painted with the hand of a master."

The Morning Post.—"It is masterly in its poignancy, and is of considerable constructive ingenuity. He expresses himself with great individuality."

The Daily Mail.—"Its cleverness is prodigious. The composer conducts with great ability."

The Telegraph.—"It is very expressive indeed, built up to a fine climax, one of the best things that has come from the composer."

FIRST SONATINA in A minor. Op. 74	3	6

"Must be classed as one of the finest works in modern organ literature. The first movement is practically in usual Sonata form. The development section is particularly brilliant, and the quiet cadence leading into the recapitulation is of arresting beauty."

"The slow movement, in the nature of a chaconne, is beautiful and restful. A brilliant cadenza leads to an exciting introduction to a most interesting triple fugue (confined to manuals). Afterwards the composer works backwards through the sections preceding the fugue, unwinding himself, as it were, before starting on a magnificent Coda befitting a magnificent work."—Daily Mail.

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ and JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of Daily Technical Practice. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

PASSION SERVICE

(Only published in Vocal Score)

FOR THE SEASON OF
LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' Mr. Gaul's work will undoubtedly greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed. The work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul has to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

Arranged for a limited Orchestra—namely, Strings, 2 Flutes, 2 Clarinets, 2 Cornets, Bass Trombone or Euphonium, and Kettledrums.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.

MORNING.

'Tis morn, and the gallant bark bounds free
In the joyous gale o'er a sunlit sea;
And the waves, as they merrily waft her along,
Welcome her onward with dance and song.

But a black cloud looms from the western sky,
And tells as it scuds of a tempest nigh,
And the sea-eagle screams as he flaps in the shrouds,
Like a warning voice from the bursting clouds.

THE STORM.

It comes! it comes! the storm!
The shrieking, shattering storm!
With the thunder's crash, and the lightning's flash,
'Mid the yawning skies and the wild waves' dash!
See yonder, that form—'tis the fiend of the storm!
How he whirls the good ship in the might of his wrath,
To the gulf where the foam surges white on his path!
And a wild cry rings thro' the tempest shrill,
As she sinks in the billows, and all is still.

EVENING.

'Tis eve on the waters; an ocean of light
Bares its breast to the moon, rising gentle and bright;
And the stars, as they beam on the silv'ry main,
On the calm of its depths are all mirror'd again.

Ah, list! o'er the deep doth a melody sweep,
Now the storm-fiend hath flown and the waves are asleep!
Ah, list! o'er the grave of the true and the brave!
'Tis the mermaiden sighing her dirge on the wave!

Price Fourpence.

The gratuitous loan of Orchestral Parts, as also the same arranged as Pianoforte Duet, may be had on application to the Composer.

THE TEN VIRGINS

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

"Will be heartily welcomed by all who love the art of music."
—Newcastle Journal.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard, and will assuredly be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers . . . treated in a thoroughly artistic manner . . . a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality of style."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"Works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—the 'Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins.'"—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"The choral writing in 'The Ten Virgins' is alone something to be thankful for, and, as we have intimated, it is only one of the many musical virtues of the Cantata."—Leamington Chronicle.

"Bow and Bromley Institute Choir.—The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to encore every other number of the work. That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."
—The Musical Times.

"The subject is an excellent one for a Cantata . . . a stronger work than 'Joan of Arc.' Melodious, vocal, and of moderate difficulty, and, like Mr. Gaul's earlier Cantatas, will be eagerly welcomed by societies in search of new works having these characteristics."—Newcastle Daily Leader.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever. Mr. Gaul has aimed at fine outline and telling colouring, and all that he has aimed at he has achieved."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth, gilt 4s.
Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal Parts, each, 1s.; Words only, 5s. per 100.

Performed by the Birmingham Festival Choral Society.

Staff Notation. Fortieth Thousand.

JOAN OF ARC

AN HISTORICAL CANTATA

FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

"Few Cantatas are as rich in chaste melodies, charming choruses, and exquisite orchestration as Alfred R. Gaul's 'Joan of Arc,' performed for the first time in Plymouth by the Vocal Association in the Guildhall."
—The Western News.

"Must enhance the high reputation of its composer."—Liverpool Courier.

"The inspiration of a highly-refined musician. . . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City.'" —Huddersfield Examiner.

"No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"Gives the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description."—The Shields Daily News.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.;
Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal parts, each, 1s.; Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100.
(Ent. Stationers' Hall.)

The loan of instrumental parts may be had on application to the Composer, and full liberty is given to perform these Cantatas and to insert the words in any programme without further permission.

TECHNIQUE
AND EXPRESSION
IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING
BY
FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

DOCTORS OF MUSIC,

Mus. Bac.s, L.R.A.M.s, A.R.C.M.s, F.R.C.O.s, testify in strong terms to the value of the Macdonald Smith System of Touch and Technique and use it with their pupils. Sir Frederick Bridge has made more than one public reference to it. It may therefore be adopted with every confidence. Mr. Macdonald Smith dictates each lesson personally, and no pupil is too backward or too advanced for one or other of his Three Courses. It is worth your while to find out what the System can do in your case, from "Light on Pianoforte Playing," which will be sent free on application.

Complete Course of Lessons by Correspondence,

Three Guineas (by Instalments if desired).

Course "B" for Beginners, Course "C" for Players.

"PIANOFORTE PLAYING," and other Articles

Terms and Conditions for Personal Lessons (to Concert Players only) on application.

M. Macdonald Smith, 19, Bloomsbury Square, London, W.C.

DO YOU NEED TO PRACTISE YOUR MUSIC BEFORE YOU CAN PLAY IT SATISFACTORILY?

Most players need to practise a new piece over and over before they can give a satisfactory rendering, and probably this is the case with you.

If you were a good sight-player your fingers would fall instinctively and automatically on the right notes, and you would obtain immeasurably greater pleasure from your playing.

Years of daily practice MAY make you a good sight-player, but my System cannot fail to do so.

I guarantee that a pianist of average ability will become able to play any piece within his or her technical ability after three months of about 15 minutes' daily practising. The testimony of hundreds of students will amply corroborate this claim.

Booklet sent free to any pianist.

APOLOGY TO MADAME BLANCHE MARCHESI.

In an article entitled "An Operatic Genius," inserted in the February number of Nash's Magazine, which purported to be an exclusive interview with Miss Felice Lyne, that lady is reported to have said, "I studied under . . and Madame Blanche Marchesi, but neither of them did me much good."

After the publication of the Magazine, Miss Lyne drew our attention to the fact that she had expressly told the interviewer she had not at any time studied under Madame Blanche Marchesi, of London, the well-known operatic singer and teacher, and Miss Lyne also wrote to Madame Blanche Marchesi, explaining this to her, and expressing her regret that such a mistake had been made.

We accept the entire responsibility for our interviewer's error, and hereby sincerely apologise to Madame Blanche Marchesi for the very serious mistake which has been made, and wish to assure her of our very great regret thereat, and we have undertaken to make this apology as public as possible with a view to minimising the damage and annoyance which such article has occasioned.—The National Magazine Co., Ltd.

THE BUILDING OF AN ORGAN AT LIVERPOOL'S CATHEDRAL ORGAN WORKS.

The above is the title of a brochure which illustrates and describes Liverpool's great Organ Building Works. It is of particular interest and suggestiveness to all concerned with the Building or Re-Building of an Organ. A copy may be obtained FREE by filling in and posting the coupon at foot.

RUSHWORTH & DREAPER'S Cathedral Organ Works, Liverpool, are notable as one of the few establishments in the Kingdom where every portion of an Organ, from smallest Fitting to the Case, can be designed and completed under one roof.

Prior to the opening of their magnificent new Works early last year, this Firm had chiefly confined their operations to the North of England and North Wales. The first important RUSHWORTH Organ was built in 1839, by the Grandfather of the present members of the firm, and has a record of over seventy years' continuous service. This has been followed by a succession of fine instruments for nearly all the more important Churches and Chapels.

RUSHWORTH Organs have ever borne an honourable repute for artistic sincerity of Construction, and refinement, balance and devotional quality of Tone. Bishops, the Clergy, and Ministers of all denominations have made them the subject of public and private commendation. Leading Organists and Authorities have unreservedly praised them.

The great new Works with their unrivalled equipment of modern Appliances and Machinery and large staff of Artist Craftsmen being now fully organized, the firm are in a position to undertake Contracts for Organs of the highest class in any part of the world. They respectfully invite opportunities for submitting references, testimonials, specifications and inclusive estimates.

NEW EDITION (1912).

A

HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC

CONTAINING

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS

Fellow of The Royal College of Organists.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, Durham, and Edinburgh; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, The Royal College of Organists, and The College of Preceptors. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO THE NINTH EDITION.

The author desires to acknowledge his great indebtedness to the authorities of the London University; the Royal Academy of Music; the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music; The Royal College of Organists; Trinity College of Music, London; and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, for their kindness in allowing him to incorporate copies of their latest Examination Papers in Parts II. and III. of his Handbook, in order that he might present their latest examination requirements.

LETTER FROM A YORKSHIRE SOLICITOR.

A. L. SASS, Esq., c/o Messrs. Bosworth & Co.,
17, Hanover Square, W.

Sir,—I take the liberty, although a total stranger to you, of expressing my thanks for the benefits derived from your little book on "The Secret of Acquiring a Beautiful Tone." I had relinquished the Violin for about 15 years, and on resuming found I had lost both power and purity, and, in spite of practice, the squeakings and scrapings were not to be dispelled. I blamed everything but myself, until I got your book, and then found that the fault consisted simply in the way I was holding the bow. On putting into practice your teachings, the immediate benefit in purity was simply astonishing, and your book was the best Violin lesson I ever had—and certainly the cheapest. I recommend all amateurs—and for that matter not a few professionals—to study your book, and if they do not find improvement, then all I can say is they have been remarkably well taught to begin with.

I am, yours truly, J. E.

The Musical Times
AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.
APRIL 1, 1912.

AN UNKNOWN COMPOSER OF TO-DAY: M. ERNEST FANELLI.

By M.-D. Calvocoressi.

Towards the end of February, a surprising piece of news spread through Paris like wildfire, exciting musicians and reporters alike: M. Gabriel Pierné had discovered, by sheer accident, a totally unknown composer of genius; a man who, about thirty years ago, had begun writing symphonic works of the highest originality and interest, in which the most advanced tendencies of the modern French school were wonderfully forestalled, but had never succeeded in getting his music produced. He was now living in the utmost poverty; and, having applied to M. Pierné for work as a copyist of music, had submitted as a specimen one of his own scores, which had greatly interested not only M. Pierné, but all the members of the Colonne Orchestra.

At first sight such sensational news might have appeared suspicious, but for the guarantee afforded by M. Pierné's reputation as a musician. And M. Pierné vouched not only for the truth of the story, but also for the intrinsic merits of the composer's music: 'M. Ernest Fanelli's craftsmanship,' he asserted, 'is admirable, and astonishingly modern considering the time when he began to write. I obtained the Prix de Rome in 1882, and I can confidently say that in those times our art was very different from M. Fanelli's. Wagner's influence was not yet felt in France; we did not know the Russian school, and Debussy's creative powers hardly asserted themselves before 1890 or thereabouts. M. Fanelli's idiom, remarkably original and subtle, includes most of the modern acquisitions.' He also said that the scoring was novel, effective, and unusually excellent to its minutest details. And he did not content himself with words, but actually decided to give without delay, at the Concerts Colonne, of which he is the conductor, a performance of the score accidentally submitted to him.

This performance took place on March 17, and the set of tone-pictures, 'Thèbes,' thus abruptly revealed was received with indescribable enthusiasm. This triumph, no doubt, was partly caused by sympathy for the composer, and also for M. Pierné, who had boldly and disinterestedly staked his reputation as an expert. But I do not hesitate to say that this work amply deserved to be known and favourably received, and that it may be judged on its intrinsic merits, all sentimental considerations being cast aside.

'Thèbes,' inspired by descriptive parts of Théophile Gautier's 'Roman de la momie,' is one of M. Fanelli's earliest works. I should not say that in idiom and in technical treatment it is as far in advance of its time as well-meaning journalists would have it; but in idiom and in treatment as well as in invention it is unimpeachable. And the severest judge will find it modern in spirit, for it reveals a keen, refined sensitiveness that has come to independent, straightforward expression; a bold sense of the picturesque, a free command of technical resources (the orchestration is truly beautiful, and the form, though 'irregular,' is clear and coherent enough). In this respect M. Fanelli has shown himself a real precursor, even if his music does not resemble actual impressionism any more than it resembles the French music of the early 'eighties.

In some parts of 'Thèbes,' it is true, one notices the Oriental tinges with which works like Borodin's, for instance, have rendered us familiar, but which one is astonished to find so adequately compassed in the music of a composer who was guided by his mere imagination—never having come into contact with Eastern music or with the East.

M. Ernest Fanelli, whose father, a Bolonese, was a plain bank-clerk, was born in Paris, June 29, 1860. He began to study music at the age of ten, and afterwards entered the Paris Conservatoire. He gave up attending the classes on account of the terror inspired by the brutality of one of the masters, and consequently was expelled. At thirteen he began to earn his livelihood as a kettle-drum player in small orchestras; at sixteen, owing to the protection afforded by a friend, he was re-admitted to the Conservatoire, and followed for a time the class of Délibes. But being obliged to work for his daily bread, he did not find sufficient time to do his tasks; so he progressed little. He did not pursue to the end the regular course of tuition; but after leaving the school he continued to work, and acquired the greater part, if not the whole, of his technical proficiency through reading scores, or, whilst playing some minor instrument in the orchestra, sedulously observing what was going on around him. Towards the age of twenty-two he applied himself to composition in earnest. After the set of symphonic pictures of which 'Thèbes' is a part (and which he left unfinished after working at it from 1883 to 1887), he composed a very important orchestral suite, 'Impressions pastorales,' for which he tried in vain to obtain a performance (1890). His other works are four 'Humoreskes' and a 'Suite Rabelaisienne' for orchestra (1890-92), a Pianoforte quintet (privately performed in 1892), a lyric scene entitled 'l'Effroi du Soleil' (1891-92), and several vocal pieces with orchestral accompaniment.

In works like 'Thèbes,' or the 'Impressions pastorales'—and especially in the latter—the association of descriptive tendencies and of unalloyed idealism is striking. The colours, the musical imagery, the concrete character of the inspiration of some passages, contrast sharply with certain flights of unfettered poetic fancy. The properly descriptive parts (viz., the parts that suggest picturesque emotions) are interspersed, in 'Thèbes,' with sentimental suggestions, with episodes of love, with lamentations of war-prisoners; in the 'Impressions pastorales,' with dreams of hope or of terror, with actual hallucinations—all that, one may episodically remark, is in flagrant contradiction to the æsthetics of true 'impressionists,' and reveals in M. Fanelli a touch of romantic spirit.

Another remarkable trait of his individuality is a vivid sense of humour in its most grim form, of the grotesque, and a certain taste for the weird and the lugubrious—which would also be romantic but for the latent irony that one detects even in his most ghastly fancies. In 'l'Effroi du Soleil,' for instance, the nightmare of an executioner is graphically depicted: a severed head bounces from the scaffold, rolls over the hills and dales, the executioner vainly pursuing it and confusing it, at last, with the setting sun, whilst torrents of blood cover the whole landscape. This unusual lyric-work, however, is caricatural rather than melodramatic. Other weird vocal pieces are entitled 'Mors' (poem by Victor Hugo), and 'The Nightmare'; they are not in the same sardonic vein. But the very titles of the 'Suite Rabelaisienne' (founded on three chapters of the books of Gargantua and Pantagruel), of the 'Humoreskes' (the fourth of which includes a 'Satanic' scherzo), speak for themselves.

Most of M. Fanelli's works are extremely developed; and it is possible that their length may have discouraged the few people to whom they had been formerly submitted. For a performance of the 'Impressions pastorales,' I am told, three hours are necessary; 'l'Effroi du Soleil' occupies about forty-five minutes; even the songs with orchestral accompaniments are of unusual duration, the orchestra alone taking charge of tolerably long episodes. On the other hand, the set of tone-pictures, 'Thèbes,' lasted but thirty minutes. Judging from it and from a perusal of certain other scores, I should say that in M. Fanelli's music redundances are comparatively few: the composer has the gift of abundant invention, and is quite equal to sustained working out. As already mentioned, he is an expert in the art of scoring; it should be added that he is fond of using a very full orchestra, including many brass instruments. In fact, he acknowledges that were he not refrained by practical considerations, he would like to add to his orchestra quite a number of the instruments used in military bands. The cast of the 'Impressions pastorales' includes two sarrusophones, two saxhorns, alto and bass clarinets, an organ, and human voices—all of which, after all, is pretty reasonable. M. Fanelli uses these instruments most musically; he scores not for the eye, but for the ear, and is guided by a very delicate sense of hearing. His scoring is never coarse, nor harsh, nor hollow, and his choice of harmonies as well as of timbres reveals his tact as well as the independence of his imagination.

It is said that his desire was to be introduced to the public not with 'Thèbes,' but with one of his later works; and possibly the 'Impressions pastorales' and the 'Humoreskes' show his individuality in a fuller light. Nevertheless, I believe that M. Pierné was perfectly right in selecting 'Thèbes' for a first venture. Even if in some respects the later output is more 'modern,' these three symphonic pieces, besides being modern enough, are good music—and good music, after all, is neither modern nor ancient. Being satisfied with M. Fanelli's first work for its unquestionable spontaneity and its power of suggestion, we need not give undue weight to the question of his rank as a precursor; the matter may well be left to future historians.

A more interesting problem might be derived from the fact that since 1894 he has not composed a single note. From that time to the day when he was introduced to M. Pierné, his tale is one of resignation and poverty. He followed the contemporary evolution of music with interest, although, on account of his situation, in a very incomplete way. When asked whether during that long period new ideas have come to him, he merely shakes his head. Certainly, he is a man of whom much may be expected; and, despite his misfortunes, he never lacked confidence in himself. It is to be hoped that now, the burden of poverty being removed from him, he will find fresh inspirations as well as renewed courage.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY OF LONDON.

On May 21, 1827, 'Mr. Liszt' (then sixteen years of age) played a Pianoforte concerto by Hummel. The next event worth special record was the first appearance of Mendelssohn at the concerts. On May 25, 1829, 'a Sinfonia MS. never performed' (to quote the ambiguous language of the programme), by the young composer, then in his twentieth year, was given under his own direction. This was the C minor Symphony, now rarely revived. After the performance, Mendelssohn sent the following letter (in French) to the Committee:

> I deeply feel the honour of which the Philharmonic Society has deemed me worthy, in performing a Symphony of my composition at the last concert, an honour which I can never forget. I know that my success, obtained through the brilliant execution of the orchestra, is due much less to my talent than to the indulgence shown to my youth; but, encouraged by a reception so flattering, I shall labour to justify the hopes entertained of me, to which I undoubtedly owe the kind feeling shown to me.

The wonderfully precocious Overture to 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' which was brought forward on March 1, 1830, must have provided a much greater sensation than the conventional symphony.

It was in this year (on February 6) that the Argyle Rooms, in which, till then, all the concerts of the Society had been given, were destroyed by fire. The library of the Society was very fortunately saved. The concert-hall belonging to the Italian Opera House was engaged and used until 1833, after which the concerts were given at Hanover Square Rooms, until they were removed to St. James's Hall in 1878.

For some years after 1830 Mendelssohn furnished the chief novelties of the programmes. In 1832 (May 14) his overture, 'Fingal's Cave,' was given.

At the general meeting of the Society held on November 5, 1832, the following resolution was unanimously passed:

That Mr. Mendelssohn Bartholdy be requested to compose a Symphony, an Overture, and a vocal piece for the Society, for which he be offered the sum of one hundred guineas.

That the copyright of the above compositions shall revert to the author after the expiration of two years, the Society reserving to itself the power of performing them at all times, it being understood that Mr. Mendelssohn have the privilege of publishing any arrangement of them as soon as he may think fit after their first performance at the Philharmonic Concerts.

and sent to Mendelssohn, who replied that he felt highly honoured by the offer, which he accepted with thanks. On his arrival in London, early in 1833, he informed the Directors that the scores of the Symphony and Overture were ready, and that as he had composed two Overtures they might have the choice. All three works were accepted. The Symphony was that known as the 'Italian,' and the Overtures were the 'Meeresstille' ('Calm sea') and the Trumpet overture, all of which were performed during the season. In 1835 Spohr's symphony, 'Die Weihe der Töne' (generally called in England 'The power of sound'), was brought out. It was received with much approbation, and performed many times, but now it is relegated to the shelf. In 1834, Mendelssohn's overture 'Melusine' (described on the programme as 'The Mermaid and the Knight') was performed. Gluck's name appears for the first time in 1839, when his 'Che faro' was sung. In 1841 'The Hymn of Praise' was given by the Society for the first time in London (it having been produced at the Birmingham Festival on September 23, 1840). On June 13, 1842, Mendelssohn's 'Scotch Symphony' was produced under the baton of the composer, who also played his Pianoforte concerto in D minor. In 1842 Chopin's name appears for the first time, Madame Dulcken playing the F minor Concerto. Schubert is also represented this year for the first time, Herr Staudigl bringing forward 'The Wanderer.' Schubert's instrumental music was not heard until 1844, when on June 10 his Overture 'Fierrabras' was performed. In the same year Bach was first recognised by a performance of an Overture and Suite; and Mendelssohn's 'First Walpurgis Night' was performed for the first time in this country on July 8. In 1846 Costa was appointed permanent conductor, and from this time forward the programmes make no mention of 'leader.' Beethoven's Mass in D was given on May 4, 1846, and Mendelssohn's Violin concerto was introduced to this country by Sivori on June 27. The same composer's 'Athalie' was given on March 12, 1849. A notable first appearance was that of Joachim, on May 31, 1853, when the violinist, who was then in his twenty-first year, gave a remarkable performance of the Mendelssohn Concerto. Schumann was represented for the first time at these concerts when, on April 3, 1853, his 'Overture, Scherzo and Finale' was given. On May 30 of this year Berlioz appeared as conductor, and the programme included the Symphonic-poem, 'Harold in Italy,' the naïve and beautiful short oratorio, 'The Repose of the Holy Family' (now known as 'The Childhood of Christ'), and the Overture, 'Le Carnaval Romain,' which work must have greatly startled the conservative audience. In 1854 Costa had some difference of opinion with the Committee, and he resigned. A bold stroke was then made; Richard Wagner was engaged to conduct the 1855 season. The story is best told in his own words:

At this time I had an extraordinary application, such as I have never received again. In January (1855) the London Philharmonic Society wrote asking me if I would be willing to conduct their concerts for the season. I did not answer immediately, as I wanted to obtain some particulars first, and was very much surprised one day to receive a visit from a certain Mr. Anderson, a member of the committee of the celebrated Society, who had come to Zürich on purpose to ensure my acceptance.

I was expected to go to London for four months to give eight concerts for the Philharmonic Society, for which I was to receive in all £200. I did not quite know what to do, as, from a business point of view, it was of no advantage to me, and, as far as the conducting went, it was not much in my line, unless I could rely on at least a few high-class artistic productions.

He states that the prospect of once again handling a large and excellent orchestra struck him favourably, and he was fascinated by the idea that he had attracted the attention of that remote world of music. After some hesitation he accepted the invitation, and later on proceeded to London as the guest of Mr. Präger. He says:

After spending the first night at his home, I installed myself the following day, with his help, in a house in Portland Terrace, in the neighbourhood of Regent's Park, of which I had agreeable recollections from former visits. I promised myself a pleasant stay there in the coming spring, if only on account of its close proximity to that part of the park where beautiful copper beeches overshadowed the path. But though I spent four months in London, it seemed to me that spring never came, the foggy climate so overclouded all the impressions I received. Präger was only too eager to escort me when I went to pay the customary visits, including one to Costa. I was thus introduced to the director of the Italian Opera, who was at the same time the real leader of music in London; for he was also director of the Sacred-Harmonic Society, which gave almost regular weekly performances of Handel and Mendelssohn.

He found that Sainton, the violinist, had originated the idea of inviting him (Wagner) to conduct. He goes on to say:

I soon discovered, too, that Sainton had in this case acted with the rashness characteristic of his nation. It had never occurred to Costa that he would be taken seriously in his statement to the Philharmonic Society, and he was thoroughly disgusted at my appointment. As he was at the head of the same orchestra which was at my disposal for the Philharmonic Concerts, he was able to foster an attitude of hostility to the undertakings for which I was responsible, and even my friend Sainton had to suffer from his animosity without actually realising the source of the annoyance.

After some reference to the hostility of Mr. Davison, then the critic of The Times, Wagner says:

As I had been completely absorbed in the delight of handling a good, full orchestra, with which I hoped to give some fine performances, it was a great blow to learn that I had no control whatever over the number of rehearsals I thought necessary for the concerts. For each concert, which included two symphonies and several minor pieces as well, the Society's economical arrangements allowed me only one rehearsal.

At the first concert we played Beethoven's 'Eroica,' and my success as a conductor seemed so marked that the committee of the Society were evidently prepared to make a special effort for the second. They demanded selections from my own compositions as well as Beethoven's ninth Symphony, and conceded me two rehearsals as an exceptional favour. This concert went off quite passably. I had drawn up an explanatory programme for my 'Lohengrin' Overture, but the words 'Holy Grail' and 'God' were struck out with great solemnity, as that sort of thing was not allowed at secular concerts. I had to content myself with the chorus from the Italian Opera for the Symphony, besides putting up with a baritone whose English phlegm and Italian training drove me to despair at the rehearsal. All I understood of the English version of the text was, 'Hail thee, joy' for 'Freude, schöner Götterfunken.' The Philharmonic Society appeared to have staked everything on the success of this concert, which, in fact, left nothing to be desired. They were accordingly horrified when The Times reporter fell on this performance, too, with furious contempt and disparagement. They appealed to Präger to persuade me to offer Mr. Davison some attentions, or at least to agree to meet that gentleman and be properly introduced to him at a banquet to be arranged by Mr. Anderson. But Präger now knew me well enough to dash their hopes of obtaining any concession of that sort from me. The banquet fell through, and, as I saw later, the Society began from that time forward to regret my appointment, realising that they had an entirely intractable and pig-headed person to deal with.

Wagner conducted the whole eight concerts of the season. Not very much music of his own composition was included in the programmes. There was a selection from 'Lohengrin' (described above), the 'Tannhäuser' Overture was performed twice, and that was all. The 'Eroica,' the 'Leonora' Overture, the Choral Symphony, and the Symphony in A of Beethoven were the most important features of the programmes. The invitation to conduct was not extended to another season.

In 1856 Sterndale Bennett was appointed conductor, and for some years nothing of special importance occurred. Clara Schumann played Mendelssohn's D minor Pianoforte concerto on April 24, 1856, and in the same year (on June 23) Schumann's 'Paradise and the Peri' was produced in England for the first time. On May 18, 1857, Rubinstein played his Pianoforte concerto in G, and on June 29 Beethoven's Violin concerto, hitherto unaccountably neglected, was played by Mr. Cooper. Schumann's Symphony in C appeared for the first time in 1864, and his Pianoforte concerto in A minor was performed by Madame Schumann in 1865. In 1866 Sterndale Bennett resigned, and Mr. W. G. Cusins entered upon a long period of authority. The year 1867 brought forward Schumann's D minor Symphony, and most notably the Schubert 'Unfinished.' On June 3 Sullivan made his débût with the Overture 'Marmion,' which he composed expressly for the Society. The programme for April 8 of this year included Schumann's Symphony in D minor, performed for the first time in England. A rather drab period in the history of the Society now ensued. In 1870, Madame Norman Neruda, the first lady violinist to appear at these concerts, played Mendelssohn's Violin concerto, and the next event of importance was on April 2, 1873, when the 'Requiem' of Brahms was given for the first time in this country. The same composer's Symphony in C minor was given on April 10, 1877, and his 'Variations on a theme by Haydn' on May 14 of the same year. The year 1878 witnessed the introduction of Schubert's great Symphony in C. In 1881 the dramatic Symphony, 'Romeo and Juliet,' by Berlioz, was performed twice, with the assistance of the South London Choral Association (Mr. L. C. Venables), under Mr. Cusins. The first Liszt Symphonic-poem to be played at the Society's concert was that entitled 'Hungarian,' which was performed on February 23, 1882. In 1883 there was an 'In memoriam' Wagner concert, at which Sarasate brought forward for the first time in this country the Max Bruch 'Scotch' Violin concerto (Op. 46). Cusins conducted for the last time on May 30, 1883, after sixteen years' service.

LOUIS GRABU.

By W. H. Cummings.

King Charles the Second on his return to his native land, after a long exile of over twenty years, soon gave convincing proof of acquired tastes and habits which were not only foreign but also false. If we examine his acts, moral, political, religious, or artistic, we shall find that he almost invariably patronized the evil and neglected the good. A striking evidence of his betrayal of a sacred trust was his appointment of Isaac Vossius to a Canonry in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, although he declared that 'this learned divine will believe anything except the Bible.' One of the King's first resolves, in 1660, was to restore the royal musical establishments of the Chapel and Palace; these had been entirely swept away during the Commonwealth. Charles the First seems to have employed at least seventy-five singers and orchestral players in his permanent staff of musicians. Some of these joined the King's army, and many of those who survived the conflicts were restored to their former places by his son. Amongst them were the notables, Captain Cooke, Henry Lawes, and Christopher Gibbons; but foreigners were soon introduced. The records give the names of 'four Dutchmen, Benigne le Ragois, Nicholas Caperon, Melque Goldt, and Hugh Fitchert, as trumpeters in ordinary.'

Amongst the numerous aliens who came to England in the train of Charles the Second was a French musician, Louis Grabu (his name is variously spelt Grabue, Grabut, Grebus). He must have been a special favourite of the King. He received valuable appointments in rapid succession: violin in the Private Musick, composer to His Majesty's Musick, and in a very short time (in 1666) he displaced John Bannister, a very capable English musician, as head of the King's band of twenty-four violinists. In the following year he was made the master of the select band, twelve in number. Pepys in his Diary, on February 20, 1667, makes an entry that at the Duke of York's 'they talk how the King's viallin Bannister is mad that the King hath a Frenchman come to be chief of some part of the King's Musique, at which the Duke of York made great mirth.' Shortly after this Pepys had an opportunity of hearing and seeing Grabu; on October 1, 1667, he wrote 'to Whitehall, and there in the Boarded-Gallery did hear the musick with which the King is presented this night by Monsieur Grebus, the master of his musick; both instrumentall—I think twenty-four violins—and vocall; an English song upon Peace. But, I never was so little pleased with a concert of musick in my life. The manner of setting of words and repeating them out of order, and that with a number of voices, makes me sick, the whole design of vocall musick being lost by it. Here was a great press of people; but I did not see many please'd with it, only the instrumental musick he had brought by practice to play very just.'

The various musical appointments held by Grabu brought him an income of eight hundred pounds per annum. He had other pickings of considerable value; for example, £165 9*s.* 6*d.* in 1668, for 'fayre writing severall dances, aires, and other musick,' a payment for training two boys, and £16 2*s.* 6*d.* yearly for 'livery.' In 1672, he was paid £137 4*s.* 6*d.* for 'fayre writing and pricking severall sorts of musick,' and £20 'for riding and other charges in attending the King to Dover'; also £117 4*s.* 6*d.* for 'other services.'

These tokens of favour were not regarded with equanimity by rival musicians, and it is interesting to note that Pelham Humphreys, who undoubtedly was a genius and a competent judge, whilst generally condemning the performance of the King's Musicians, made a special attack on Grabu, as is recorded by Pepys on November 15, 1667. He wrote: 'Humphreys said that Grebus, the Frenchman, the King's master of the musick, understands nothing, nor can play on any instrument, and so cannot compose: and that he will give him a lift out of his place; and that he hath already spoken to the King of Grebus.'

We find that an order was made on March 27, 1674, 'to deliver to Monsieur Grabu, or to such as he shall appoynt, such of the scenes remayning in the theatre at Whitehall as shall be useful for the French Opera at the theatre in Brydges Street, and the said Monsieur Grabu to return them again safely after fourteen days' time, to the theatre at Whitehall.' Grabu had composed an opera, 'Ariadne, or the Marriage of Bacchus,' the music of which can no longer be found, but the libretto was published with the title 'Ariadne, or the Marriage of Bacchus, an Opera or a Vocal Representation; First compos'd by Monsieur P.P. Now put into musick by Monsieur Grabut, Master of His Majesties Musick. And Acted by the Royall Academy of Musick, at the Theatre-Royal in Covent-Garden In the Savoy, Printed by Tho. Newcombe 167$\frac{3}{4}$.' There is a fulsome and mendacious address to 'The King's Most Excellent Majesty,' from which some interesting passages may be quoted: 'Your Vast Mind not fully satisfied, would compleat the Splendor and Magnificence of your Imperial seat, by establishing within her stately Walls your Academy of Opera's, the fairest and most charming of all Publick Showes; your Majesty will doubtless find these First Representations of Your Opera very defective: But Sir, it dares flatter itself with hope that You will pardon its faults, and consider that the Academy that executed the same is yet an Infant, a new-born Beauty, whose Features and Lineaments are scarce come to their shape and proportion; but cannot fail growing to Perfection in her due time and age, provided You daign own her for your Creature, and afford her Your Royal Care and Protection. These Gracious Favors, Sir, she humbly, and with a most profound Respect and Veneration, begs at Your Royal Hands; with a sincere Protestation, that her chiefest Application and Study shall ever be to strive to the Uttermost of her Power, to contribute to Your Diversion, And that she will gather together Your Palms, Your Laurels, and Your Mirtles, into Wreaths and Garlands of Triumph to Crown Your Sacred Head with, as being Sir — Your Majesties Most Humble, Most Obedient, and most faithful Servant and Subject, Your Royal Academy of Musick.'

No account of the performance of the opera is available, but in all probability it was a failure, and possibly brought the Royal Academy to an end. A few anonymous lines have been preserved which may have had reference to it:

> Each Actor on the stage his luck bewailing,
> Finds that his loss is infallibly true.
> Smith, Nokes and Leigh in a fever with railing
> Curse poets, painter and Monsieur Grabu.

The scenery was not returned within the period prescribed, and on April 27 a warrant was issued 'to deliver to Sir Christopher Wren, His Majesty's surveyor generall of the works, the scenes belonging to His Majesty's theatre at Whitehall, which were formerly delivered to Mr. Grabu for the use of the French Opera in Bridges Street.'

Evidently Grabu had offended his royal master in some way, and after having been a special favourite the downfall must have been hard to bear. On the following St. Andrew's Day, 1674, an order was made for payment to the King's musicians, and we find the note, 'Lewis Grabu, vacatur, Mr. Staggins in his place.'

We lose touch of Grabu for some time, but apparently endeavours were made to restore him to favour, with the result that in 1677, January 17, six of the King's violins were 'ordered to attend to practise Mons. Grabu's musick.' The hopes raised were, however, destined to disappointment, and on May 5 following the 'Petition of Lewis Grabu' was presented to the King, 'shewing that the petitioner has lately fallen under very grievous misfortune, the greatest of which hath been His Majesty's willingness to receive another person into his place during pleasure. Your Majesty was nevertheless graciously pleased a few days since to declare that the petitioner should receive the growing benefit thereof until the arrears due to the petitioner should be paid to him, which he accordingly humbly presents in the paper annexed, which arrears being paid to the petitioner for the keeping him from arrests and the providing some subsistence for his distressed family, your petitioner shall, though with much griefe, retire from being a meniall servant to Your Majesty. The petitioner therefore humbly prays Your Majesty according to your Royal compassion to a poor servant, guilty of no crime but misfortune, that you will give effectuall order for the speedy payment of the said arrears, and that in the meanwhile he may be maintained and supported as others are under all circumstances in the like case with him, and that all his salary may run on till the said arrears be paid.' The King received the petition, and we read: 'His Majesty refers the consideration of this petition to the Lord Chamberlain, to cause the arrears due to be stated, and then report the same together with his Lordship's opinion thereon.'

The Lord Chamberlain lost no time in investigating the matter thoroughly, and on June 5 he made the following report: 'In observance of Your Majesty's reference upon the petition of Lewis Grabu by the Hon. Sir Joseph Williamson, one of Your Majesty's Secretaries of State, I do humbly certifie that there is due in arrears to Lewis Grabu, late Master of Your Majesty's music, the sums following in these severall offices, vizt:

'Out of Your Majesty's Exchequer, the sum of £450; out of the Office of the Treasury Chamber £145 4*s*. 6*d*.; and out of the Great Wardrobe £32 5*s*. And I find his condition to be very poor and miserable, all which I humbly submit to Your Majesty's wisdom. (Signed) Arlington.'

We should naturally expect to find evidence that the poor musician's just dues were immediately paid; but the King could only provide money to squander on his mistresses. In one year he gave £136,668 10*s*. to the Duchess of Portsmouth. Pepys in his Diary refers to the well-known fact that 'many of the musique' not having received their salaries were on the point of starvation. Grabu's debt remained for ten years unsettled; a record, dated December 8, 1687, shows 'that Mr. Grabu received all his arrears as master of the music to his late Majesty although not actually in his said Majesty's service at the time of his decease.' King Charles died in 1685, and Grabu had been dismissed from his service in 1674. He had therefore waited thirteen years for the money he had earned! It could not be alleged that he passed out of the knowledge of the King and the Duke of York, for in 1685 he had been associated with Dryden in the production of an opera, 'Albion and Albanius.' This was first performed at the Queen's Theatre in Dorset Gardens on June 3, 1685, and for the sixth time on the 13th of the same month. Dryden published the libretto of the opera simultaneously with the performance, and in a long and interesting preface discussing opera in general, includes some particulars respecting the composer, Grabu, and the preliminary rehearsals. He says, King Charles 'had been pleased twice or thrice to command that it [the opera] should be practised before him, especially the first and third acts of it; and publicly declared, more than once, that the composition and choruses were more just and more beautiful than any he had heard in England. How nice an ear he had in music is sufficiently known; his praise therefore has established the reputation of it above censure, and made it in a manner sacred. It is therefore humbly and religiously dedicated to his memory.' Of the music, Dryden writes: 'I have advantages not common to every writer; a knowledge of the Italian and French language, and being conversant with some of their best performances in this kind; which have furnished me with such variety of measures, as have given the composer, Monsieur Grabut, what occasions he could wish, to show his extraordinary talent in diversifying the recitative, the lyrical part, and the chorus; in all which, not to attribute anything to my own opinion, the best judges, and those too of the best quality, who have honoured his rehearsals with their presence, have no less commended the happiness of his genius and his skill. And let me have the liberty to add one thing, that he has so exactly expressed my sense in all places where I intended to move the passions, that he seems to have entered into my thoughts, and to have been the poet as well as the composer. This I say, not to flatter him, but to do him right; because among some English musicians, and their scholars, who are sure to judge after them, the imputation of being a Frenchman is enough to make a party, who maliciously endeavour to decry him. But the knowledge of Latin and Italian poets, both which he possesses, besides his skill in music, and his being acquainted with all the performances of the French Operas, adding to these the good sense to which he is born, have raised him to a degree above any man who shall pretend to be his rival upon our stage. When any of our countrymen excel him, I shall be glad, for the sake of old England, to be shewn my error; in the meantime, let virtue be commended, though in the person of a stranger. To conclude, though the enemies of the composer are not few, and that there is a party formed against him of his own profession, I hope, and am persuaded that this prejudice will turn in the end to his advantage. For the greatest part of the audience is always uninterested [disinterested] though seldom knowing; and if the music be well composed, and well performed, they who find themselves pleased will be so wise as not to be imposed upon, and fooled out of their satisfaction.'

The foregoing preface was written before the death of Charles, and published as already stated in 1685; the music of the opera was published in March, 1687, with the title, 'Albion and Albanius, an opera or Representation in Musick, set by Lewis Grabu, Esquire; Master of His late Majesty's Musick.' It is printed in a large folio volume, and is preceded by an address: 'To the King' [James]: 'Sir, After the shipwrack of all my fairest Hopes and Expectations, in the Death of the late

King my Master, Your Royal Brother of ever Blessed Memory, the only Consolation I have left, is that the Labour I have bestowed in this Musical Representation, has partly been employ'd in paying my most humble Duty to the Person of Your most Sacred Majesty. . . . My late gracious Master was pleas'd to encourage this my humble Undertaking, and did me the Honour to make some Esteeme of this my Part in the Performance of it: Having more than once condescended to be present at the Repitition, before it came into the publick View. Your Majesty has been also pleased to do me the same Honour, when it appear'd at your Theater in greater Splendour, And with more advantages of Ornament: And I may be justly proud to own, that you gave it the particular Grace of Your Royal Protection. As the subject of it is naturally Magnificent, it could not but excite my Genius, and raise it to a greater height, in the Composition, even to surpass itself: At least, a vertuous Emulation of doing well, can never be so faulty, but it may be excus'd by the Zeal of the Undertaker, who laid his whole Strength to the pleasing of a Master and a Soveraign. The only displeasure which remains with me, is, that I neither was nor could possibly be furnish'd with variety of excellent Voices* to present it to Your Majesty in its full perfection. Notwithstanding which, You have been pleas'd to pardon this Defect, as not proceeding from any fault of mine, but only from the scarcity of Singers in this Island. So that I have nothing more at this time to beg, than the continuation of that Patronage, which your Princely Goodness hath so graciously allow'd me: As having no other Ambition in the World, than that of pleasing You, and the desire of shewing myself on all possible occasions, and with the most profound Respect, to be Your Majesty's Most humble, most obliged and Most obedient Servant, Lewis Grabu.'

It is noteworthy that this address was printed before the payment of the moneys due to Grabu, and we may hope that he escaped the imposition of a tax such as was imposed in 1686 on other musicians of his late Majesty who received a lump sum of £483 6*s.* 8*d.* in discharge of £1,933 6*s.* 8*d.* originally due, in accordance with an order for 'Making such a deduction throughout as His Majesty hath commanded in cases of arrears.'

The opera was not a success; and it has been suggested that it was withdrawn from the stage because of the Monmouth rebellion, the news of which was received by express messenger on the last night of its performance; but it is significant that, notwithstanding the approbation of Dryden and the King, no attempt was made to revive it. A perusal of the libretto, the whole of which was set to music, and of the composer's score, induces wonder how an audience could patiently have listened to it more than once. The lines of the poet are generally of the poorest description, and the music matches them; it is difficult to decide which is worse. Some anonymous scribbler of the day wrote:

> Grabut, his yokemate ne'er shall be forgot,
> Whom th' God of tunes upon a muse begot;
> Bayes† on a double score to him belongs,
> As well for writing, as for setting songs;
> For some have sworn the intrigue so odd is laid,
> That Bayes and he mistook each other's trade,
> Grabut the lines, and he the music made.

Dryden's preface affords evidence of his ignorance of the art of music, and his assertion of the superiority of the French nation as a musical people reads oddly when contrasted with the following lines extracted from his Prologue to the opera:

> In France, the oldest man is always young,
> Sees operas daily, learns the tunes so long,
> Till foot, hand, head, keep time with every song;
> Each sings his part, echoing from pit to box
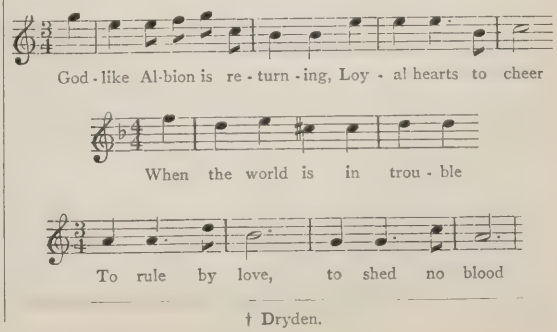
> With his hoarse voice, half harmony, half pox.

This barbarous custom must have ruined any good music; it prevailed in Paris even in the time of Gay (1719), who wrote:

> But hark! the full orchestra strikes the strings,
> The hero struts and the whole audience sings;
> My jarring ear harsh grating murmurs wound,
> Hoarse and confused, like Babel's mingled sound.
> Hard chance had placed me near a noisy throat,
> That in rough quavers, bellowed every note.
> 'Pray, Sir,' said I, 'suspend awhile your song,
> The Opera's drowned, your lungs are wondrous strong.

A few words may be added respecting the music as printed in the score of 'Albion and Albanius.' One curious feature in the orchestration is that the overture, preludes, and incidental music are scored in five- and six-part harmony for strings, a 'Consort of Viols.' The recitatives with which the work abounds are mostly accompanied by harpsichord alone. Usually when the bass voice has a solo his part is identical with the instrumental bass-viol. There are a few places where two flutes take up the accompaniment, without violins, and in one number 'Gittars' are associated with the flutes. The overture and several succeeding numbers are in one key, D minor, producing a feeling of monotony. A trio, 'Nymphs of the city,' is curiously written in alternating duple and triple bar measures. In the matter of just accent the composer fails very frequently, and it is difficult to imagine that Dryden could have heard and approved. Three examples will suffice:



* Who the singers were is not known; the names are not printed in the libretto.

† Dryden.

The printed score gives the G clef in two positions, on the first and second lines of the staff, and the C clef in four positions, on the first, second, third and fourth lines.

No reference to Grabu and his doings can be traced after 1687, until 1690, when he was engaged to compose the instrumental music for Beaumont and Fletcher's 'Maid's Tragedy' as altered by Waller. The place and date of his death are unknown.

Occasional Notes.

In the large and varied mass of free advice that was hurled at Mr. Hammerstein at the close of his winter season, the suggestion that he should give opera in English was one of the most prominent, and he seems to have yielded, somewhat grudgingly, to its insistence. Two British operas—'The children of Don,' by Lord Howard de Walden and Mr. Holbrooke, and 'Fionn and Tera,' by the Duke of Argyll and the late Mr. Learmont Drysdale—will be produced, and 'Die Meistersinger' will be given in an English version. For the rest, Mr Hammerstein's summer season, which is to commence on April 22 and to continue until July 13, will be run on the plan which failed in the winter; that is to say, French and Italian operas, many of them unfamiliar to our public, will be performed without 'stars' except those of Mr. Hammerstein's own making, and high prices will be charged. The difference is that this time he will have an adequate backing from a subscription list. The promised répertoire is as follows:

(In French.)

'Don Quichotte,' 'Hérodiade,' 'Le Jongleur de Notre-Dame,' 'Werther,' 'La Navarraise,' 'Contes d'Hoffman,' 'Faust,' 'Roméo et Juliette,' 'Le Prophète,' 'Quo Vadis,' 'Les Huguenots,' 'Le Luthenier de Crémone,' 'William Tell,' 'Merry Wives of Windsor,' 'Robert le Diable,' 'La Reine Fiametta.'

(In Italian.)

'Il Trovatore,' 'La Favorita,' 'Dolores,' 'Lucia di Lammermoor,' 'Rigoletto,' 'La Traviata,' 'Il Barbiere de Siviglia,' 'Andrea Chenier,' 'Un ballo in Maschera.'

The Covent Garden Syndicate, fortified with purchased rights, offers a more interesting programme. The season will open with two cycles of 'The Ring' and 'Tristan und Isolde' in German, without cuts. The performances will be timed to allow an adequate dinner interval between the first and second Acts. The dates are as follows: 'Rheingold,' April 23 and May 3; 'Die Walküre,' April 25 and May 4; 'Siegfried,' April 27 and May 6; 'Götterdämmerung,' April 29 and May 8; 'Tristan und Isolde,' May 1 and May 10. The répertoire for the remainder of the season is the following:

(In Italian.)

'Aïda,' 'Il Barbiere di Siviglia,' 'La Bohême,' 'Carmen,' 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' 'Conchita,' 'Faust,' 'I Giojelli della Madonna,' 'Madama Butterfly,' 'Manon Lescaut,' 'Mefistofele,' 'Il Pagliacci,' 'Rigoletto,' 'Il Segreto di Susanna,' 'La Tosca,' 'Tess,' 'La Traviata,' 'Gli Ugonotti.'

(In French.)

'Faust,' 'Louise,' 'Pelléas et Mélisande,' 'Roméo et Juliette,' 'Samson et Dalila,' 'Thaïs.'

'I Giojelli della Madonna' (Wolf-Ferrari), and 'Conchita' (Landonai), are new to England. The Russian Ballet will arrive in June.

The revised syllabus of the examinations for musical degrees at Dublin University are a bold and timely practical recognition of new conditions of musical life, and new ideas in the teaching of theory and composition. The chief innovations are the following:

Figured basses are set only in the preliminary Mus. Bac. examination.

There is no strict counterpoint in the Mus. Doc. examination.

The exercise may be avoided altogether, and a practical examination be taken at the organ or pianoforte for both Mus. Bac. and Mus. Doc.

If the exercise is preferred, it may take the form of a string quartet (Mus. Bac.) or symphony (Mus. Doc.)

Dr. Percy Buck's design, which, it may be hoped and expected, will meet with wide approval, is to give as much credit for musicianship as for scholarship.

The South Place Sunday Popular Concerts persevere on their interesting course. That given on March 17 was especially notable, for, in order to celebrate St. Patrick's Day, the programme was entirely devoted to the works of Sir Charles Stanford. We give the programme:

String quartet in G minor (Op. 99).
Irish Fantasies for violin and pianoforte.
Pianoforte quintet in D minor (Op. 25).
Irish Song Cycle, 'Cushendall.'
Seven old Irish airs.

The singer was Mr. Plunket Greene, and the composer took part at the pianoforte.

We do not usually give prominence to any matter which may be regarded as of a trade nature, but we cannot refrain from chronicling the fact that on May 10-14, the British Music Trades' Convention, a great gathering of those who represent the various branches of the industrial side of musical art, will meet at Brighton for the purpose of discussing matters of interest both to the trade and the musical public. We think the Convention Committee has been very happy in selecting Brighton for its place of meeting, in that Brighton possesses one of the pioneers of Municipal Orchestras.

The programme of the forthcoming Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace has been announced. 'Israel in Egypt' will be given on June 25, a selection from 'Samson' on June 27, and 'The Messiah' on June 29. The performances will in each case commence at 2.30 p.m. The rehearsal day is June 22, when the proceedings will open at 12.30. Sir Frederic Cowen will conduct.

Dr. Ethel Smyth writes to us as follows:

I am much gratified at your devoting so much space in your last two numbers to me. In view of the appreciation the Press of this country has recently shown me, and still more perhaps given the testimony from abroad, in which temptation to an over-favourable estimate of home produce cannot play a part, it may surprise you to hear that no single composition of mine has ever been performed at any British Festival, though I regularly implore for even a bare ten minutes.

The details of the arrangements for the International Music competition and demonstration to be held in Paris at Whitsuntide are now taking definite shape. As stated in our supplement, the Competition Festival Record, last month, 45 choirs from England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland have entered in the Competitive Choral section, which will be held on Whit-Monday. The number of choralists thus concerned is over 3000. This means that our choirs are prepared to incur an expenditure of at least £6,000 for their jaunt. The French, Belgian, Swiss, and other choirs that have entered bring the total to 176, and the number of singers to nearly 11,000. Whit-Tuesday will be devoted to the performances of choral organizations who desire simply to perform and not to compete, and to a competition of Parisian school children, to which the Paris Council has invited 500 London County Council children as their guests. School choirs from elsewhere in this country would be welcomed, but the Paris Committee do not undertake to board and lodge more than the 500 from London. As to the representation of British Choirs in the non-competitive section, there is as yet no full information, as the entries are not asked for until April 15. But Dr. Coward has definitely undertaken to take a choir of 200 voices. The Paris Committee have an onerous task before them in having to arrange for so many visitors, but from what we can gather they are prepared to meet their responsibilities.

THE PSEUDO-BACH 'LUKE' PASSION.

By E. W. Naylor.

Mr. Newman's article on 'Recent Bach Literature' is very comforting to those who, like myself, have taken the liberty to disbelieve that Bach wrote the 'Luke' Passion, in spite of the supposed 'fact' that the MS. was in Bach's handwriting. Mr. Newman tells us that Johannes Schreyer has shown this 'fact' to be no fact; and that the greater part of the supposed autograph is not in Bach's handwriting.

No one who knows and understands Bach can help seeing innumerable points in the 'Luke' Passion which, whether taken singly or together, make it impossible to believe that Bach could be the author, at least of the greater part of the work.

Who, then, is the author?

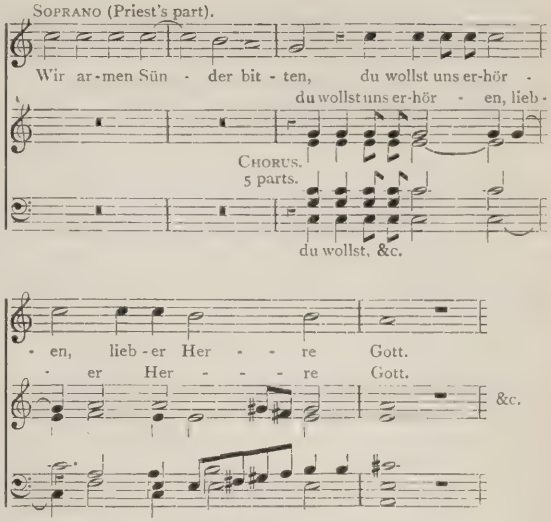
I write these paragraphs mainly for the purpose of pointing out to any one who has time and opportunity to undertake the investigation, that at any rate three authors are to be looked for.

One of these may very well be Heinrich Schütz, who died in 1672, after a long life of eighty-seven years. The pseudo-Bach 'Luke' contains quotations from the German Litany as set by Schütz in four parts. Here is a passage from 'Die deutsche gemeine Litaney' (see Breitkopf & Härtel's complete edition of Schütz, vol xii., p. 163):

Ex. 1.

Again, a more complicated version of the same, with the priest's part in the soprano (see later), from Schütz's six-part Litany, vol. xii., p. 189:

Ex. 2.



Soprano (Priest's part).
Wir ar-men Sün - der bit - ten, du wollst uns er-hör - du wollst uns er-hör - en, lieb - Chorus.
5 parts.
du wollst, &c.
- en, lieb - er Her - - - re Gott.
- er Her - - - - re Gott.
&c.

The reproduction of these may be seen in the pseudo-Bach 'Luke,' in the Choral No. 23:

Ex. 3.

Here the actual notes of the plainsong and the characteristic harmonization are seen to be taken from the four-part Schütz; while the setting of the priest's part for soprano is a recollection of Schütz's larger work in six parts. It is strange to think that relics of the latter fashion are still with us: at Winchester College certain versicles and prayers are occasionally chanted by two College boys, and not by a person in Orders; and at Lincoln Cathedral the Litany is always sung by two laymen, members of the choir.

Other quotations from the Litany as known to the compiler of the 'Luke' Passion are to be seen in Nos. 27 and 35.

Another movement which strongly suggests Schütz is the 'Bist du Christus?' (Art Thou the Christ? tell us).

Schütz's splendidly vigorous setting of this chorus of priests and scribes begins thus (see his 'Passion according to St. Luke' (Breitkopf, vol. i., p. 109):

Ex. 4.

sa - ge es uns Bist du Christus, sa - ge es,
Chris-tus, sa - ge es, sa - ge es, sa - ge es uns, sa - ge es uns, sa - ge es, sa - ge es uns, sa - ge es, sa - ge es uns, sa - ge uns, &c.

In the setting of the same chorus in the pseudo-Bach 'Luke,' both the subject, 'Bist du Christus?' and the counter-subject, 'Sage es uns,' have the most striking resemblance to Schütz (see No. 43):

Ex. 5. = of Ex. 4.
sa - ge es uns, Bist
Bist du Chris-tus, sa - ge es uns,
Bist du Chris - tus,
du Chris-tus, sa - ge es uns, sa - ge es uns, sa -
Bist du Chris-tus
Bist du Chris - tus, sa -

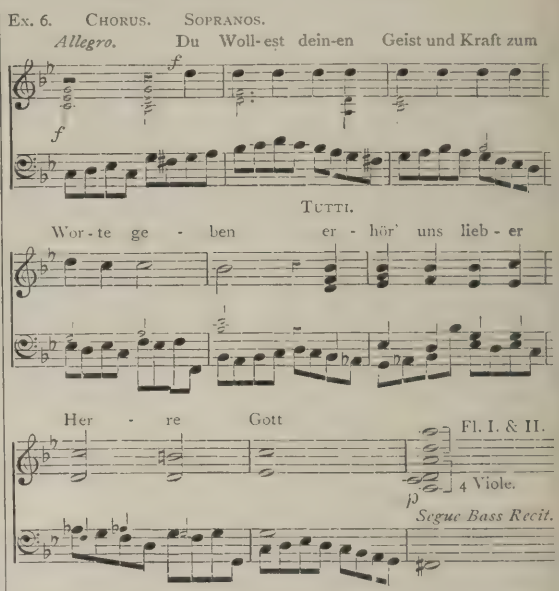
A third feature which is characteristic of Schütz is the solemn playing of a sinfonia after Jesus dies on the Cross. The pseudo-Bach uses a choral 'Ich hab' mein' Sach' Gott heimgestellt' for this purpose (No. 72); and this may be compared with the corresponding place in Schütz's 'Seven Words,' where an instrumental symphonia is found. This is not a suitable opportunity for discussing the very considerable beauty of the air (No. 77), 'Lasst mich ihn nur noch einmal küssen,' in the course of which the Choral No. 72 is cleverly employed. In passing, it may be said that no one who has a true appreciation of Bach could suppose this interesting air to be his, whether as a youth or an aged man.

Mr. Newman says (Musical Times, January 1, 1912, p. 10) that 'the infallibility of Spitta's judgment, and his very competence as a musician, have been sharply called in question.' Well they may! I follow on the same side. Spitta wrote the enormous 'Life' of Bach (vol. i., 1873, vol. ii., 1880: Novello's English edition in three vols., 1884-85). Spitta likewise made detailed studies of the features of Bach's Cantatas, of which he seems to have had enormous knowledge of a certain kind. Spitta was also the editor of the great Breitkopf edition of Schütz in sixteen volumes (1885-94).

So he knew the Schütz Litany named above, and he knew Bach's Cantata for Sexagesima very well indeed (Bach Society: No. 18, p. 239-247), judging by his remarks upon it (see Novello's English edition, vol. ii., p. 492). In his account of this cantata, Spitta recognizes that the words of the German Litany are being used by Bach, but shows no sign of noticing that the music also is a quotation from H. Schütz.

Here is the passage from the Bach cantata, 'Gleich wie der Regen,' &c., after the tenor recitative:

Bach's Quotation from Schütz.



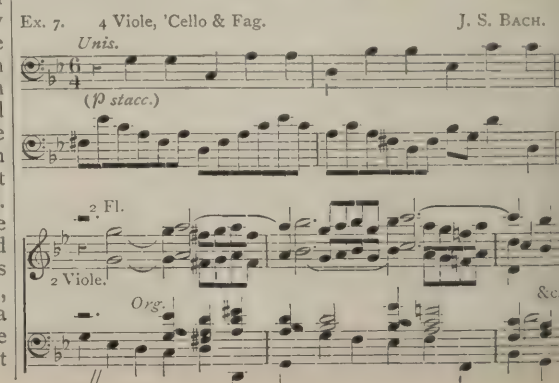
Spitta remarks (English ed., vol. ii., p. 498) on this: 'Bach invariably gives the first line of Litany to the soprano alone'; thus losing his chance of explaining that Schütz did so too, and that this music is a recollection of Schütz.

This remarkable movement consists of alternative recitative and chorus, each recitative being separated from the next by an extract from the Litany, sung by the choir. There are four responses in all; and Bach's moving orchestral bass is the only important alteration of the original Litany by Schütz.

Mr. Newman's comments on Spitta's views of Bach as a 'pictorialist' (pp. 13 and 14) are well illustrated by Spitta's own criticism of the instrumental introduction to this very cantata of Bach. He doubts if Bach meant anything definite by the sinfonia! Is it not obvious what Bach meant? 'Like as the rain and snow fall down from the sky and return not thither again, but refresh the earth, and make it fruitful,' &c.

Bach was a simple soul, like most men of solid gifts, and read these words simply—'rain' and 'snow.' Here we have his little picture—first the big drops, then the tiny drops, then the cool, clean shimmer of the snow as it lies on the fields:

'Rain' and 'Snow.'



The change from the short string tone to the long, expressionless flute notes is masterly, and shows plainly enough that Bach would have been a light of modern orchestral colour if he had been born in our time. The fagotto, which would have a good deal to do with the effect of the raindrops, ceases playing at //, and the two lower violas also rest, the continuo supplying harmonies from the word 'org.' in the extract. The flutes, of course, describe the 'innocent snow,' as our great Milton calls it. This sort of 'pictorialism' is, to be sure, quite different from what Bach gives us, for instance, in the 'Abide with me' cantata, where the notion of 'Abide' is indicated by a ceaseless repetition of one note in the orchestra; or in the great B minor Mass, where, in the Sanctus, the triune character of the Blessed Trinity is alluded to by the division of the voices into threes, and the continual use of triplets.

Yet another sort of 'pictorialism' is found in such deliberate 'imitations' of natural objects as the cock-crow in the 'Matthew' Passion, or the weeping of Peter in both 'Matthew' and 'John.'

Some of these efforts are perilously near the ridiculous, but others, fortunately, are purely symbolic and do no harm, e.g., in the case of 'Abide with me,' as I remarked some years ago, the 'conceit' is easily missed by the hearer, and if the reiterated notes are observed, they are unconsciously translated into the terms in which the rest of the composition is couched. ('Proceedings of the Musical Association,' December 18, 1905, p. 31.)

Mr. Newman is indeed right to name Schütz as a great practitioner of the art of translating images into tone. In the paper from which I have just quoted, instances of several kinds may be found, e.g., the indication of escaping from sin, where the two voices are given a series of eight 'escapes' from the great sin of consecutive fifths; the painting of the word wretched, by a change from a major chord to a minor on the same bass; the portrayal of the onset of sleep in a long chromatic scale, descending; and especially the illustration of tender pity, expressed harmonically, as follows:

H. Schütz, 1636.

THE TIME-TABLE OF THE 'RING': A SUGGESTION.

By Bertram Smith.

The coming performances of Wagner's 'Ring' at Covent Garden bring up yet again the thorny question of the time-table. On the last occasion the old system of allowing no interval for dinner, and crowding the performances into the evening hours, with short pauses between the Acts, was given a further trial. This year the management revert to the plan that was adopted some years ago of beginning in the afternoon—at four or five o'clock—and allowing an interval of an hour for dinner. It is, I think, generally agreed that both methods are thoroughly unsatisfactory. In the latter case the performances begin at an hour when many busy men are unable to attend; in the former they result in a long, congested evening, terminating about midnight, during which one must subsist on snatched sandwiches and hardly-won coffee. For one need be no epicure to demand an opportunity for dinner in the course of a 'Ring' drama. There are some four hours of solid music to be enjoyed, or endured, in each of them, and the strain is already quite sufficiently great without being enhanced by the pangs of hunger.

Of course the trouble is, as most people admit nowadays, that the 'Ring' dramas are too long. But that does not imply that there is any ready means of shortening them. The very suggestion of 'cuts' finds the Wagnerian public up in arms, and thus it is that we must go through with it to the bitter end, though it is safe to say that under the present conditions at least thirty per cent. of the audience are worn out before the close, and not a few have reached that stage of operatic headache when one begins to dread the inroads of brass instruments. That is a frame of mind which clearly does not conduce to the enjoyment of those tremendous finales. There are not a few of the less enthusiastic who solve the problem by resort to one or other of two dreadful expedients—they either cut the first Act and dine, or cut the last Act and sup. Is it not possible to find a better way?

The enjoyment of music depends quite as much upon the frame of mind of the hearer as on the quality of the performance, and in hearing the 'Ring' under these conditions we are by no means getting full value for our investment. If that fact were fully realised the reform that I wish to suggest would, I think, appear to be perfectly reasonable. It is simply that the 'Ring,' instead of occupying four evenings, should be spread over six. Then we should hear the whole of it in perfect comfort, without strain or weariness, without hunger or privation. If one comes to examine them the four dramas will be found to fall into an admirable division for the purpose. On the Monday evening—'Rheingold,' say at 8.30, lasting two hours and a-half. On the Tuesday—the first two Acts of 'Walküre,' say at 8 p.m., lasting (with an interval of twenty-five minutes) three hours. On the Wednesday—Act 3 of 'Walküre,' followed by Act 1 of 'Siegfried,' lasting (with an interval of half an hour) three hours. On the Thursday—Acts 2 and 3 of 'Siegfried,' lasting (with an interval of twenty-five minutes) three hours. On the Friday—the Prologue and Act 1 of 'Götterdämmerung,' beginning at 8.30 p.m. and lasting (without an interval) two hours. Finally, on the Saturday—Acts 2 and 3 of 'Götterdämmerung,' lasting (with an interval of twenty minutes) two and three-quarter hours.

I submit that each of these would make an admirable entertainment, and I do not think that there need be any sense of anticlimax in their conclusions—except perhaps at the close of Act 1 of 'Götterdämmerung.' On the Tuesday night—after the fight in the clouds between Hunding and Siegmund—the hearer would surely go away satisfied, and on the Wednesday he is again carried up to a fitting climax, in Siegfried's splitting of the anvil. On Monday, Thursday, and Saturday the final curtain will fall at the proper close of three of the four dramas; and he will hear their finales, not with jaded senses but in a reasonable and receptive frame of mind.

And there is not only the audience to consider. The strain on the management and performers must be enormously reduced by this arrangement. The quality of the performance is bound to profit by it. There will be no need for the Siegfried to save his voice assiduously in the early Acts, and one will hear him, perhaps for the first time, attack the great duet in the third with freshness and vigour.

Above all, I am convinced that 'Götterdämmerung' would gain greatly in effectiveness were it thus divided. For as it is, even at Bayreuth, where the performance can be enjoyed with a minimum of fatigue and discomfort, it is simply too big a mouthful. Looking back upon it at the close, and following it through all the twists and turns of its long and tangled tale, from the Norn scene on the mountain top to the catastrophe at the end, one realises that it can hardly be assimilated all at once. It is such a mass of differing moods and divergent scenes. One must pass in review in a single evening Norns, Walküres, Rhine Daughters, Gibichungs, Alberic the dwarf, Grane the horse, a vast chorus of vassals; and follow at the same time the working-out of the story of Siegfried and Brünnhilde, the romance of the ring and the downfall of the gods.

No doubt the true Wagnerian, to whom tradition is sacred, will have no good word to say for my suggestion; but I firmly believe that the effect of the whole would gain, not only by the more leisurely conditions, but also in a better sense of unity and consecutiveness. The 'Ring' is one drama and not four, and by the very fact of introducing new divisions, and bridging over the gaps between the sections, we would, I think, arrive at a finer continuity. If ever the plan be adopted, may I be there to see!

PROPHETIC HISTORY.*

We have received from Mr. J. Swinburne, a long treatise purporting to be the article 'Music,' from a History Cyclopædia of 2012. Mr. Swinburne states that he received it out of space, and declined to give any corroborative particulars. Although the treatise comes from space, it does not bring with it any of that valuable abstraction. Therefore we are compelled to be content to print only extracts.

A brief account of the state of music at the commencement of the 20th century, beginning with the influence of the pianoforte, will first be given.

It is not necessary to describe this instrument, as there are many specimens still preserved in museums. The pianoforte was in such widespread use that its influence was paramount at that time. In estimating the position of an art, it must be borne in mind that its real condition as a whole depends not on the few at the top, but on its rank and file. In England at that time there were some millions of pianofortes. Every house except the poorest had one; and these pianofortes were nearly all used by women. It was an understood thing that girls should learn to work the pianoforte, and it was assumed in spite of all evidence to the contrary that women were artistic and musical by nature, and men entirely matter-of-fact. The advances made about the middle of the century in the study of the human brain have shown very clearly that the musical faculty is exceedingly rare in women; though very occasionally strongly developed. But the co-ordinating or telegraph apparatus by which the lower part of the brain controls the muscles is just as well developed in one sex as the other. Women have therefore just the same power of acquiring rapidity of finger as men. This, as we now know, has nothing to do with what is ordinarily called the intellect, but only with the parts of the brain concerned with sub-conscious working. The musical faculties are quite distinct and have practically nothing to do with this function of the brain; and though highly developed in exceptional women, they are generally almost non-existent, their place being taken by very elaborate faculties relating to altruism and to common-sense in the ordinary affairs of life. This was not at all understood at that time; and as some of the still older ideas of chivalry still remained, men idealised woman and ascribed to her all sorts of romantic qualities she does not possess, and denied her others, even more valuable, that she does.

After pointing out that it was generally considered that most girls of the middle- and upper-classes at least must necessarily be musical, the writer goes on to say that:

The natural result was that execution on the pianoforte and music came to be regarded as synonymous. Practising scales and exercises was dignified with the name of studying music. A girl who did finger gymnastics on the other side of the Channel claimed to have studied music abroad, and so on. This led to digital facility not only being put before music, but overshadowing it altogether, and taking its place in popular estimation. All pianoforte music was made as difficult as the objects for which it was written would permit. Ten per cent. of the pianists tackled music as difficult as they could play and ninety so difficult they could not. People went to a recital not to hear any particular music, but to hear or say they had heard a particular executant. The executant thus in many cases became a spoilt child, and wore long hair and a 'Who is that?' hat. This interest in executants was artificially inflated by newspapers. Adulation of executants developed into a kind of hero-worship, and at the end of each performance the audience made a loud noise, each person wishing to show as much appreciation as the others, or more.

The orchestra of a hundred years ago was a fortuitous collection of instruments which had never been designed for the purpose, but had merely grown up. It might be supposed that at that date the orchestra would have had different characters of tone right through the scale, as in the organ. Taking the instruments in turn, the piccolo and flutes had no tenor or bass. Flutes of low pitch existed, but were not used. The oboes, bassoons, and corno inglese (so called because it was not English, and was not a horn), did not make up an orchestral reed stop. The tenor oboe ended in a spherical bell because it always had been made that way. The clarinet and oboe had flared mouths for an equally cogent reason. There was a bass clarinet sometimes, but no tenor; so there was no clarinet stop in the orchestra. There were also too few oboes, flutes, or clarinets for them to have any power or individuality except in soft passages. That clarinets could give a full body of tone was fully realised in the military band, but it was not utilised in the orchestra. It would have been easy to arrange the wood-wind so that all the holes were normally closed, one key opening the holes for each note. But flutes, oboes, clarinets, and even saxophones and sarrusophones were hampered by needing many fingers to produce one note, because the Medean and Persian pipers used this method five thousand years before. The trumpets had no treble; they had tenor and bass trombones, and they very nearly made an orchestral stop. The slide trombone had the honour of being the only wind instrument in the orchestra that could be played in perfect tune, though it was very difficult to get great accuracy. The horns had no treble and no bass, but to make up for this bass bugles were brought in from the brass bands. A tenor valve bugle was also employed sometimes. It was generally called an alt-horn, because it was neither a horn nor an alto. The only complete stop in the orchestra was the strings; they formed the backbone, and as orchestras increased in size the strings increased in number while the wood-wind remained the same, so that it was ineffective. It might have been supposed that in such an active age the orchestra would have been made up of instruments designed for the purpose. The only instruments that were really designed as a set to give a complete scale were the saxophone and sarrusphone, but they were not part of the orchestra.

There is a curious mystery about the orchestra that no historian has been able to fathom. Each score was written in a number of different keys. The only solution that has ever been put forward is that score practice was a mixture of exaggerated conservatism and a kind of mediæval priggery.

The organ in 1900 was a very curious instrument. There was a mania for size and power, and it became very complicated. There were at last so many keyboards and stops that the mechanical devices became so numerous that secondary mechanical devices had to be used to control them. A proposal to introduce an adjustable organ-seat led to serious riots.

The organ was not played by women, as mere finger dexterity was such a small proportion of the organist's art that women could do little with it. They seldom got further than playing hymns and a kind of pabulum known as the organ andante. Some specially musical women got further and were even welcomed into the College of Organists. But that was all. Women thus generally knew nothing about the technique of the organ, so the public knew nothing about it. People did not go to a pianoforte concert to hear particular music, but to hear a favourite player; in the case of the organ, they went to hear a particular instrument. If a pianist played to a room half-full of people who had been given free tickets it was chronicled in all the newspapers as if it was of some great public importance; but if an organist played to a couple of thousand people no notice was taken—in fact, one of the musical papers charged a groat and a-half for inserting a bare notice of the programme. The organists of that day formed a sort of brotherhood. They had a College of their own into which they admitted their brothers and a limited number of their sisters after searching examinations not in mere execution on the instrument, but in the technology of music. They formed a little world of their own, and worked away without getting any credit from the public, love for their art and approbation of their brother organists being their only spur. Thus the leading pianists' names were known all over the world, while the corresponding organists who were all-round musicians of high attainments as well as executants were hardly known by name outside the profession. Yet they formed the backbone of the educated musicians of the country, and had most of the advanced music-teaching in their hands.

The Moanium had hardly any influence. It was much used by people of small means, especially in the manufacturing districts. There were three kinds, the simple blowing moanium of French and the simple sucking moanium of American origin, and the complicated self-working affairs with trumpets and drums and fancy names, known as the pandemoanium.

All the other important instruments were monophonic, that is to say, they produced only one note at a time. The fiddle was the most popular instrument of this kind. It was easy to tell who could play it most rapidly, so the public worshipped the facile fiddler as much as the pianoforte virtuoso. We learn that in those days a fiddler always played music that was a little too fast for him to get in tune; and that if he had to play any long notes, he always played them vibrato, as that was his idea of playing with expression.

The violin had come to the end of its development, not because it was perfect, but because it was assumed, on no foundation whatever, that the instruments made by certain early makers were beyond improvement. Probably there was a little snobbishness at the bottom of this notion. Every violinist was supposed to possess a Cremona of fabulous value, which he prized more highly than his life.

To understand the position of the solo singer in those queer old times, we must mention the opera first. The theory of the opera was that the arts of the drama, music and painting should combine to produce a glorious whole. They did not fit, and got in one another's way. But the real basis of the opera was snobbery and vulgarity. The savage instincts of the woman of that day came out in reducing her clothes and replacing them by strings of beads of alumina, glucina and other oxides, but especially bits of carbon. The opera was essentially devoted to this savage display as a society function. The singers could not act, and thought it was beneath their dignity to try. They got enormous fees, and the higher the fees the more the vulgar section of the audience were pleased. The words were sung in various languages; it was not high-class to sing in English, and it was impossible to follow any plot if there was one, so that as a drama it was ridiculous. All approach to romance was crushed because sopranos and tenors had a natural tendency to become spheroidal. When a stout Teuton saw Wotan carefully balancing a shield on the summit of a horizontal Brünnhilde, he did not mind, for he said, 'I am like that, and I am all right!' But if any one with any sense of humour strayed into an opera-house it was fatal to him. Men did not care for jewelry and display of that sort, so ballets were put in to attract them. The opera with its expensive stars was the primary cause of singer-worship. The expensive star also drew the audience at the vocal concert. Even the musical public had untrained ears, and could not hear more than one note at a time. By them a vocal solo was easily understood, and the accompaniment was merely a substratum which was kept in abeyance as much as possible. People with the minimum of musical training thus liked solo singing, and as they formed the bulk of the public the singer appealed to the largest audience. The curious point about this was that even musicians seemed to accept this state of things as inevitable, and to treat the singer seriously. There was no reason why singers should not have been good musicians, and a few were excellent, but as the requirement was a good voice, singers were naturally selected from those who had good voices, not from those with musical ability. The most rigorous research has failed to bring to light what it was that teachers of singing taught; the only conjecture is that each teacher spent his whole time trying to eradicate the faults and tricks learned under the previous teacher. It was quite usual to have a high-class symphony concert in which there would be a few songs. The soloists were then advertised in large letters, and the audience gave them most applause, whatever that really was, and they got all the credit of the concert. Even good conductors spoiled otherwise fine concerts by having singers who sang entirely out of time, frequently out of tune and, worse still, with a vibrato.

Wagner made a spasmodic effort to make opera sensible. This great musician was originally championed by the superior person, and in 1912 he was getting so popular that the superior person found no superiority in admiring him, so he turned upon him and got him shelved with Mendelssohn. Opera-goers on the Continent did not care for it enough to pay for it, so the money was filched from those who did not go, under the pretence of State encouragement of Art. Snobbery thus made opera more nearly alive in England than cant did on the Continent. To the extent that it existed, it was self-supporting here.

Very little is known about the church music of that period. They used a queer form of composition with three bars in the first part and five in the second. Every now and then a discussion arose in the musical journals as to how such a form could exist, and some interesting but now incomprehensible opinions of Stainer's and Mansfield's have come down to us. Another curious thing about church music was that they had comparatively small choirs and enormous organs, especially in cathedrals.

We have not very much information about musical education in those days, as so few of the text-books came down to us. When King Edward VIII. came to the throne, they celebrated his coronation (which was committed quietly, in a Registry Office) by passing an Act for the Suppression of Idiotic Information. Under clause 19 of this Act all books used in any school, college or university were burned. Two bundles of text-books escaped, owing to a composer using them for weights in a long clock. From these and others we gather that the great object of musical education in those days was to train not the ear, but the fingers. It is true harmony and counterpoint were taught, but only as paper puzzles without reference to the ear. The students wrote exercises without knowing in the least how they would sound until they tried them. It is quite impossible that those who wrote eight-part counterpoint could hear in eight parts at that date, as there was no training of the ear. A man with natural musical ability of a high order would no doubt hear mentally what he wrote; but he was exceptional. The teaching of harmony and counterpoint must have been as fraudulent as the teaching of Latin and Greek in the schools. They had a very curious theory of teaching in those days. They taught what was known as 'strict counterpoint,' the theory being that if you could manage to write with fetters on, it was quite easy to write good counterpoint without them.

In music they had strict harmony as well as strict counterpoint. In strict harmony the student was not allowed to use any concord, or to resolve any discord, and it was only as a 'licence' or for a 'special effect' that he was allowed to write in any particular key. The theory was, of course, that if a pupil could write harmony successfully under these restrictions, ordinary harmony came quite natural and easy to him. It is curious that no specimens of compositions in strict counterpoint have come down to us; but we have quite a number in strict harmony.

What they wrongly called Theory was really the grammar of the period-but-one before. This was taught to few only, and to them on paper, not by ear. However, Rousseau invented a notation which was re-invented by Miss Glover, and a system of ear-music was developed by Curwen. All we know of him is from his 'Commonplaces of Music,' and teachers' books. These alone show that he was the most original and advanced music teacher that has so far existed. Conservatism was against his system, and though every musician used it unconsciously, most of the pupils of promise were sent to be trained by the ordinary finger and paper methods.

We are now in a position to tell of the Renascence of music. The suppression of music by women at that date has been described. The first influence in the other direction was the mechanical piano-player. This mechanism could beat women hollow in the matter of the number of notes played per minute, and it played them accurately. As far as phrasing goes it was a dead-heat in which neither of the runners started. This mechanism thus discouraged the lady pianist. Besides, about this time the woman movement was beginning. A lady pianist found that unless she was exceptionally good she had to work hard for many years, and the most she achieved was a local drawing-room reputation. This was no longer worth while, because a woman could get a world-wide reputation by applying to be called to the Bar, or for a commission in the Army, or by lecturing, or being the first lady engine-driver, or by a thousand and one antics which required no training or ability whatever. It was therefore waste of time to take up the pianoforte, except in the case of women who were really musical.

Another measure that was the result of men generally taking to music was embodied in the general Act for the Suppression of Obstructive Anomalies. This Act did away with the old tables of absurd weights and measures. It swept away all such things as the old spelling in use in 1950, but it went further, and introduced a universal language, Esperanto. In music, which was now of exceptional importance, this Act wiped out the old-fashioned keyboard on which all keys but one were makeshifts, and introduced a simple keyboard which was the same for all keys like the old Janko. Musical notation was simplified. Five lines were used, a line or space for each of the twelve notes of the octave. The first leger lines above and below were C, so that all staves differed by octaves only. Notes were thick lines, duration being shown by length. Instead of writing music like prose, it was divided up into short lines like poetry, so that the reader saw at once the rhyming relations of the melody, the harmony, and the rhythm between the various corresponding elements of the musical stanza. This was the foundation of our modern notation. Unfortunately this Act took no account of human nature and, like its forerunner during the French Revolution, it was ineffective. People went back to their silly weights and measures, their unreasonable spelling, and so on. But it was impossible to go back to the old notation or to the old keyboards. People soon forgot every word of Esperanto, so those who thought it superior to sing in languages they did not understand used it. Esperanto thus became the sole language for opera.

We have shown that at the beginning of the century, in addition to the feminine idea that music was located in the fingers, everything so far discussed was held back by the most unreasoning conservatism; but this does not apply to composition. The general public was curiously conservative certainly, and confined its attention not only to a few composers, but to a very few works of each. But the composers of the day were all trying to strike out new paths with tremendous energy. A good deal of this effort was wasted, as many of them ignored the teachings of musical history, or they would have seen that art, like nature, never proceeds by jumps. There was so far no new chord or progression that was more than a slight modification of what was already familiar to the ear. The attempts made at the beginning of the century to take sudden jumps, either by using progressions which had no apparent musical sense or by dropping all interconnection between the parts of a composition, naturally came to nothing. At the same time, there was a sort of feeling that melody or tune was played out. The curious thing was that the men who were old, and had therefore heard more melodies in their lives, were not those who pretended to be tired of them. A development which had great results was the simultaneous combination of two or more melodies, not on the principle of the Blind Mice, or the old Quodlibet, but more on the lines of an early treatise by the Earl of Corder,* which appeared in the Musical Times of that period.

Melody, however, was not really dead. It had lasted in gradually changing form for five or six centuries, and as it was most vigorous towards the end of the 19th century, it naturally did not die suddenly at the beginning of the 20th. It developed; and as people's ears got trained, it became less obvious. Musical people were able to follow changes into more remote, without forgetting the original, keys; and rhythms got much more complicated without defying comprehension. Moreover, the power of producing good melodies was much increased, as soon as melody was taught as part of the education of a musician.

Some composers attracted a great deal of attention by writing all sorts of amazing chords and progressions. It was urged that Beethoven and other geniuses had broken the rules of their day, and therefore the later composers were geniuses too. The difference was that no one felt that Beethoven broke rules to attract attention; while music which had the effect of forcibly calling the notice of the hearer to the cleverness of the composer defeated its artistic end, when it had any. If the musician felt that something queer was written to sound beautiful, he might be led in time to accept it; but if he felt it was in fact to advertise the composer it was fatal in time, though affected composers generally had a sort of cult of admirers who were often merely superior persons.

The main factor in the evolution of our music which has raised English Art to the front rank, was the obsolescence of the pianoforte. We owe the Renascence of Music in England to the millions of women who left it alone; and to the resulting training of the ear instead of the fingers that followed this great change.

Church and Organ Music.

IMPROVING THE PLAN OF ORGANS: ANOTHER POINT OF VIEW.

By George Dixon.

An interesting paper dealing with the all-important question of the design of the Pedal organ was read at the annual meeting of the Kent section of the I.S.M. by Dr. A. T. Froggatt, and it has been given wider publicity by appearing in the Musical Times. He rightly deplores the want of attention given to this important department, especially in smaller instruments. In larger organs, at any rate in the more recent specimens, the defects alluded to are not so obvious. Most of the improvements which have lately been made in tonal design, particularly as regards the Pedal organ, are in a large measure due to the unwearied advocacy of the late Mr. Thomas Casson, who emphasised specially the principles quoted by Dr. Froggatt. These were, to provide a suitable bass for as many manual stops as possible, and also to provide [one or more] solo effects. In addition, the Pedal ought to contain within itself a suitably developed harmonic structure, but this point is not alluded to, probably because it rather concerns larger instruments. The difficulties of furnishing Pedal basses for the Great and unenclosed Choir are not so pressing as in the case of the Swell. While Dr. Froggatt does not regard Casson's schemes for dealing with the latter as entirely satisfactory, he seems to be unable to suggest any improvement. In this connection it is worthy of note that in some recent instruments the provision of Pedal basses within the Swell-box has actually been made.

* A well-known musician of the Victorian and succeeding period.

At Clare College, Cambridge, an organ of only 26 speaking stops, an entirely independent Pedal reed is included in the box and makes a most effective bass to the Swell chorus reeds. At St. Mary Redcliffe, Bristol, Pedal reeds of 32-ft. and 16-ft. pitch, also independent of the manuals, in addition to unenclosed 16-ft. and 8-ft. reeds, are enclosed in the Swell-box. How Mr. Casson's heart would have been gladdened could he have known that his ideas had actually been carried out so extensively! The plan Dr. Froggatt proposes for improving the Pedal, is to abolish the Pedal stops as such altogether, and to extend the compass of as many manual registers as possible an octave lower than at present, the Pedal clavier actuating independently the thirty lowest notes of such extended stops.

The advantages claimed are:

(1) Ease of manipulation;
(2) Homogeneity of musical effect;
(3) Saving of space and expense;
(4) Employment of large manual pipes now usually silent.

In theory and at first sight these appear to be great advantages, but let us consider whether they would really be so in practice, and whether serious disadvantages are not at the same time introduced which would more than counterbalance anything that may be gained. In the first place it may be pointed out that, however well the scheme may fulfil bass-forming requirements, it violates the principle enunciated that the Pedal should supply suitable solo effects. Such a combination for instance as Great to Fifteenth, or Mixture and full Pedal with reed, would be impossible; yet these combinations are indispensable for the proper rendering of many passages in Bach, not to mention the moderns. Since there are to be no separate draw-stops, in order to obtain a reed effect on the Pedal either the Great reed itself must be drawn or the Swell reeds must be coupled to the Great and the box opened. In either case the Pedal will cease to be a solo, as no contrast is obtained between manual and Pedal: and to make matters worse, the running counterpoint on the manuals is also obscured by the use of reeds. If, on the other hand, the Swell be simply coupled to the Pedal in sub-octave pitch, the Pedal bass to the Great will be 'instantly detached,' thus effectually preventing the use of full Pedal. Again, in a two-manual instrument it would not appear to be possible to provide Pedal tone in contrast to each manual where both are simultaneously employed as in playing trio passages. So far as registration generally is concerned, however well the draw-stops are controlled, the finest and most artistic effects can only be obtained by the building up of combinations by hand. The absence of Pedal draw-knobs would prevent such registration in that department, however complete it might be. As a matter of fact no advance whatever has yet been made on Casson's Pedal helps so far as the control of the Pedal stops and couplers is concerned.* These ingenious devices not only accomplish all that Dr. Froggatt appears to demand for bass-forming purposes, but in addition render solo effects instantly available, and allow free hand-registration to be resorted to whenever desired. It is not easy to understand why these helps have not come into more general use. The question of stop manipulation and control is, however, one for the players themselves to settle. So far as homogeneity of musical effect is concerned, the gain under the system advocated by Dr. Froggatt is probably more apparent than real. It is true that a large number of manual stops would have their present basses extended an octave lower, and he himself would continue this throughout the organ. But even if practicable, is it really necessary? The Great bass or open wood (mis-called Diapason), not having a manual counterpart, would be excluded apparently as superfluous from all but very large instruments. Here Dr. Froggatt would seem to follow Mr. Casson, who declared that our ears had become vitiated by such monstrous tone. If that actually be the case, then the present writer, and probably many others, must plead guilty. At the same time it may well be asked, In how many English organs can it be maintained that the weight of Pedal tone is excessive and out of proportion to the manuals? Mr. Casson's pedal schemes closely followed the German plan both in contents and scaling. Of the German Pedal organ it may be truly said, 'C'est magnifique (on paper), mais ce n'est pas la guerre.' If any one doubts this, let him compare the Pedal effect, say, at St. Paul's or Ely Cathedral, with that at Armley or Doncaster, and judge for himself. (The latter, by-the-way, contains twenty-five speaking stops.) Whatever be its limitations, the impressive effect of the English, as compared with the German, Pedal is due to the large-scaled Great bass. This foundation stop is wood, consequently it is in complete contrast to the manual tone, which is largely metal. The various manual departments have each their characteristic quality, and are built up in tonal contrast to each other. Can it then be logically maintained that the Pedal should not also have its own special characteristic tone quality, provided that it fulfils the office of providing suitable basses for the manual stops as far as may be practicable? All efforts should surely be directed, not to displacing this characteristic foundation tone of the English Pedal, but to supplementing it with a variety of lighter registers in the most efficient, and at the same time economical, manner possible. This brings us to the third point—the question of cost. The problem of extending manual 8-ft. stops into pedal stops of 16-ft. pitch is not so simple as it appears at first sight. It is practically impossible to accommodate the large and heavy pipes required on the ordinary slider sound-board, consequently separate wind-chests would have to be provided for them. Again, the pallets or sound-boards and actions of the extended stops would have to be independent of those not extended, otherwise there would be a very evident break in the Pedal tone below middle C, owing to the latter ceasing to sound. Thus the simple sub-octave manual to Pedal coupling-action contemplated would not suffice, and much extra mechanism, not to mention trunking, would be necessary. So far as the actual pipe work itself is concerned, it is a fact that the cost of the lowest twelve pipes of, say, an open Diapason is greater than that of the remaining pipes of the same stop. Even if the difficulties of space, mechanism, and wind supply were non-existent, the cost must a fortiori be at least proportionately increased when extensions into 16-ft. and even 32-ft. pitch are contemplated.

The comparison made between 120 pipes of the ordinary Pedal organ giving only four stops, and the same number of pipes giving ten stops, in the way proposed, is somewhat misleading. The plan of borrowing stops in 32-ft., 16-ft. and 8-ft. pitch from each other was freely used by Schulze at Doncaster, and was strongly advocated by no less an authority than the late Dr. E. J. Hopkins, and is now all but universal. Consequently a six-stop Pedal organ on this principle, comprising, say, 32-ft., 16-ft., 16-ft., 8-ft., 8-ft., and 16-ft., would represent but 126 pipes. The extension of ten manual stops, if the same proportion as to pitch was kept, would be a very much more costly affair; and while such a Pedal would of course contain a greater variety of basses, it would be comparatively ineffective in the louder combinations by reason of its necessarily smaller scale.

* Since this was written, a description has just been published in a musical contemporary, of an invention by Mr. F. H. Bond, F.R.C.O., for Pedal control which has been applied to an organ at Wellingborough. It appears to be a simplification of Mr. Casson's plan. The instrument has ordinary pedal draw-stops, and these can be freely manipulated by hand at any time, but no mention is made of the special provision for Solo effects.—G. D.

Dr. Froggatt apparently anticipated weakness in octave pedalling, but with a properly designed Pedal organ, or even in the case of the above, such gymnastic feats would seldom be required. A far more serious drawback is that a Pedal entry above middle C would be relatively so weak as to be scarcely discernible while playing on the Great organ. This defect is likely to be still further exaggerated owing to the unfortunate tendency in many instances not only to increase the manual 8-ft. tone out of all proportion to the rest of the organ, but also to make the tenor and bass octaves of such stops unduly large. All this of course helps to dwarf the Pedal tone and render it relatively ineffective in its upper register, however impressive it may be in itself.

Lastly it is claimed that many of the large manual pipes now usually silent would be more usefully employed. This of course is to a large extent true, and when considered alone it appears to be the most cogent argument in favour of the scheme. It has however been already pointed out that the Pedal, except in very large organs, would have no foundation of its own.

In discussing the utilisation of valuable pipes at present but little employed, it is somewhat remarkable that no mention is made of an economical and practical way of enriching the Pedal with a variety of soft 16-ft. registers without adding so much as a single pipe. It would almost appear from a sentence in the penultimate paragraph of his article, that Dr. Froggatt has been unduly frightened by the doctrinaire objections against legitimate borrowing, usually brought by the unthinking, and has consequently overlooked this important point. Every well-equipped instrument which makes any pretence at completeness of tonal design, should contain at least one characteristic stop of 16-ft. pitch on each manual. These registers can be usefully borrowed in identical pitch to form the softer Pedal stops without in any way detracting from their utility as manual doubles. A variety of such registers as Sub-bass, Dulciana, Salicional, Violone, Bassoon, Trombone 16-ft., &c., may thus be economically obtained for Pedal use. It is not proposed further to discuss here the question of 'borrowing,' except to point out that its legitimacy is determined by the presence of weightier 16-ft. registers on the Pedal to cover the borrowed stops when they are also drawn as manual doubles. The principle has been widely adopted in some half-dozen of our important cathedral organs which have been rebuilt within the last few years, and it is now to be still more extensively carried out in the well-known organ at Trinity College, Cambridge, at present under re-construction.

The upper work on the Pedal is not so important in smaller organs. It is doubtful whether an 8-ft. metal flue stop is really required in such cases, as its addition is scarcely felt when the Great Diapasons are coupled, and it is practically useless in softer combinations. The large-scaled open wood octave and the soft 8-ft. flute are however more useful and effective, but these will usually be borrowed from their parent 16-ft. registers. In bigger instruments an 8-ft. reed similarly provided, and a somewhat powerful mixture, add much to the effect of the Pedal organ.

Dr. Froggatt deserves very hearty sympathy in his plea for better control and design of the Pedal organ, but the plan he advocates seems to be open to serious objections, more especially as he would apparently dispense with independent stops altogether. His method, like that of borrowing manual doubles, would undoubtedly be useful in certain cases, and is in fact sometimes employed to supplement, but not to displace, what already exists. Such schemes could not, however, satisfactorily take the place of a foundation of stops characteristic of the Pedal itself and independent altogether of the manuals.

Lieut.-Colonel Dixon's article (which appears on p. 238) compels the attention of all interested in the organ and its mechanism. We have often referred in these columns to the subject of organ control, and have always felt that though of great importance, it is quite possible to overburden an organ with mechanical appliances. In early days the instrument was but poorly equipped, and one or more assistants were necessary. Then came composition pedals, pneumatic pistons, electric switches, &c., with the result that the organist of to-day must possess unusual powers of observation and adaptability when confronted with an instrument of any size, if he is to be a successful exponent of its tone-variety. But we venture to think that the limit of the necessary means of control has been reached, and that many devices excellent enough in themselves are, even if at hand, very rarely used. We know of a crescendo Pedal in a large organ which the organist never makes use of, and of another which has been removed altogether! One of the chief objections to these various appliances is that they discourage the management of stops by hand. A step in the right direction was assured by the invention of what are known as selective pistons, by which any combination of stops may be arranged temporarily on any piston.

No doubt the cultivation of the art of playing on the organ orchestral and other music not written for the instrument, led to much complication in stop-control, and that in its turn may have influenced some composers. But for really great organ-music, is not the organ becoming over-developed in this respect? And is it not in some danger of losing its characteristic dignity? Constant change is such a feature of the present day, and the average organist is seldom satisfied unless he is altering his stops or couplers. We are convinced that his energies were better employed in attention to phrasing and true organ touch. If the music can be made subservient to the possibilities of the mechanical devices of the instrument, as in extemporising, they may perhaps to some extent justify their existence, but the true artist can generally manage with the control found in the average organ.

Dr. Froggatt and Colonel Dixon have no doubt the highest motive in what they desire, and if any scheme such as they suggest tends to make the organ still more of an artistic instrument than in the hands of some builders it has already become, their recommendations will receive wide support.

Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion music will be performed with full orchestral accompaniment at St. Paul's Cathedral on April 2, commencing at seven o'clock.

Mr. C. H. Moody gave a lecture before the Yorkshire section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians at Leeds on March 9, his subject being 'English Church Music.' He quoted the criticism of a well-known musician-novelist: 'Your church music is an insult to the angels,' and while admitting that the subjection of organists to the authority of an unenlightened taste that merely 'knows what it likes' has a wide, degrading influence, he advocated the claims of the best English church music to be given a place not inferior to that of any other nation. As regards congregational singing he recommended and suggested the possibility of congregational rehearsal.

On the occasion of his completing twenty-five years' service as organist and choirmaster of Holy Trinity Church, Tulse Hill, Dr. H. Walmsley Little, was recently the recipient of presentations from the congregation and from the clergy and choir.

Tye's six-part Mass 'Euge bone,' of which a new 'performing edition' is being issued by Messrs. Novello & Co., will be sung at Westminster Cathedral on Easter Sunday.

'An evening with Mendelssohn' was held at Greaves Wesleyan Church by the Literary Society on March 6, under the direction of Mr. James Rhodes.

A performance of Cuthbert Nunn's church cantata 'Everyman' was given at St. John's, Leytonstone, on February 22. The soloists were Master Charles Hurdle (Good-deeds), and Messrs. Charles Burnett (Death), Leslie Best (Messenger), and William Cuttle (Everyman).

The annual choir festival at St. Silas's, Waverley Park, was held on February 25. Mendelssohn's 'Hear my Prayer' and Bunnett's 'De Profundis' were sung by the choir. Mr. Charles T. C. Trotman and Master Charles Bailey were the soloists, and Mr. J. Arnold Dunn, the organist and choirmaster, officiated at the organ.

On March 20, at All Saints' Church, Hastings, Gounod's Oratorio 'Mors et Vita' was performed by the members of Dr. Abram's Musical Union, assisted by the choir of the church. Mr. Henry Poole presided at the organ, and Dr. J. Abram conducted.

ENGLISH SONGS OF ONE HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

ADDRESS BY H. C. COLLES.

At a meeting of the Concert-Goers' Club, held at Novello's Music Room, 160, Wardour Street, Mr. H. C. Colles read a paper on the above topic. Dr. McNaught presided. The illustrations were excellently sung by Miss Lottie Liess and Mr. Owen Colyer. Mr. Colles said :

It is rather a curious commentary upon the musical conditions of this country that you may go regularly to 'Song recitals' given by English singers in London, and yet know next to nothing of the songs which English composers wrote a hundred or only fifty years ago. I do not say that you as individuals do not know them, but that if you do it is not because you are concert-goers.

Go back further, say two hundred years, to the time of Purcell, or three hundred years to the Elizabethans, and you have at least a chance of gleaning a pretty fair list of English songs from modern concert programmes, but you might search them diligently for a year or more and yet not find more than about half-a-dozen things written in the early 19th century which singers of to-day think it worth while to sing in public.

That is not because no songs worth singing were written then by Englishmen, nor because publishers have let them drop out of print, but I fancy it is due to the haste with which our musical appreciation has been developing in recent years. To take a homely simile, we are rather like a joint cooked on a quick fire ; we are done beautifully brown outside, but if someone takes the carving-knife and cuts to the bone, he finds us distinctly raw—to use no uglier expression. Our enthusiasms over the things of the moment are tremendously keen, but they are not built, as regards our own music, upon the enthusiasms of our forefathers, for which we have a lofty and indiscriminate scorn. I hope to show you that, at any rate in the matter of songs, we had at the beginning of the last century a certain tradition which was at least not contemptible. What was the tradition at the beginning of the 19th century in English song?

The typically English songs of the 18th century were a protest against the encroachments of Italian opera and the cosmopolitan oratorio style of Handel. They all defended the English idea of a song as a good tune expressing the feeling of certain words, rather superficially but still quite clearly, in a way which anyone with a decent voice could sing and anyone with a decent appreciation of music could enjoy.

It was a distinctly democratic idea. It hated anything 'high-falutin' or elaborate, and laughed at the idea of the singer showing off an exceptional technique, which was the ideal of Italian opera. The Shakespeare songs of Arne, for example, 'Where the bee sucks,' &c., just gave the lilt of the verse, its merriment and vigour, in an unaffected way, and attempted no more.

Boyce, too, when he got out of church and had no dignity to support was as simple a soul as ever lived. He wrote numberless little ditties on all sorts of verses, good, bad and indifferent, but mostly indifferent, which were merely tunes fitted more or less happily to the feeling of the words.

A little later we have Charles Dibdin (b. 1745), whom I always think of as an 18th century Harry Lauder, a man who made his songs 'go down' by the force of his own personality in singing them in his 'Table Entertainments' (instituted at Hutchins's Auction Rooms, King Street, Covent Garden).

But the interesting thing is that in the songs of all these very different men—Arne, a composer of 'high-class' English opera; Boyce, a learned church musician; and Dibdin, whom to-day we should call a 'music-hall artist,'—there is the same quality, a frank appeal to the tastes of ordinary performers and listeners by means of clean and ungarnished melody. I lately came across an illustration of the difference of style between the prevalent foreign music of the time and the native songs, in a rather curious way. I wrote an article for the Musical Times (November 1910) on some of Boyce's secular music, in which I quoted a silly little song of his called 'Johnny and Jenny' as an example of Boyce's simple way of setting simple words, and in connection with it I spoke of his 'facility for writing fresh melodies.' Thereupon a correspondent wrote, very courteously, but suggesting that it was not a fresh melody, but a very close parallel to Handel's song from 'Samson,' 'To fleeting pleasures make your court.' When I compared the two, however, I found that they made an ideal instance of the difference of style which I am now insisting upon.

Boyce's tune is exactly conditioned by the words at every point. There is no attempt to make more out of the music than the words naturally suggest. Handel, on the other hand, treats the words as a peg to hang some music upon. They are repeated over and over again to all sorts of musical phrases, none of which have any distinct connection with the particular words to which they are set.

['To fleeting pleasures,' from Handel's 'Samson,' and 'Johnny and Jenny,' by Boyce, were then sung.]

The song-writers of the generation after Boyce, men who were born about the middle of the 18th century, and whose work represented popular song of a hundred years ago (the first decade of the 19th century), accepted this English tradition very frankly. You see it has two main conditions:

1. The setting of the words in an intelligible way.
2. The invention of a tune.

Vocal ornament, if used at all, was quite a secondary consideration. The accompaniment can scarcely be called a consideration at all. It is easily seen why this was so, if one remembers the conditions of performance.

Songs were written chiefly to be sung at 'public gardens'—Vauxhall, Sadler's Wells, Marylebone. These places of entertainment took the place of our music-halls, exhibitions such as Earl's Court and the White City, Ballad Concerts, and even more serious concerts and opera-houses.

These songs had to hold the attention of a large number of people in a public place, who, if they did not care for the songs would find something they liked better in the dancers, the plays, or the fireworks.

It is to the credit of the composers and of their audiences that the best way to attract and please was to give good, clean and wholesome melody with no nonsense about it. There was a genuine taste for such melody, and that taste was genuinely supplied. The songs were certainly not subtle; intricate effects of vocal or instrumental expression would have been lost in such surroundings, but on the other hand they were free of mere tricks and catch phrases or trumpery vulgarity. You are to hear to-night some of the work of William Shield (1748-1829) and James Hook (1746-1827). Here are two men coming from very different parts of the country, brought up in very different conditions, gravitating to London, taking service in these remarkable institutions for public entertainment and producing very similar work—a sign that their songs were conditioned more by their public and their time than by their own natural taste or proclivities.

Shield had musical antecedents, that is to say his father was a singing-teacher by profession in Sunderland, but the fact does not seem to have determined his choice of profession, for his father, with an insight with which many teachers of singing are likely to sympathise, did not wish his son to follow in his steps. He apprenticed him to the solid and remunerative business of boat-building. As in the case of many greater musicians who have been pitchforked into worthy but inappropriate trades, Shield's music got the better of his father's prudence, and eventually he came to London to try his fortune as a musician.

Hook, on the other hand, was the son of a dissenting minister at Norwich, so that there seems still less incentive to the life he chose, unless there was something of the spirit of contradiction in his choice. Shield first earned his living as a viola-player, and then made a reputation for himself as composer to Covent Garden Theatre and Vauxhall Gardens. Hook got a post as organist and composer at Marylebone Gardens (which stood where Beaumont Street and Devonshire Street now are), and when these famous gardens were closed (1776) he transferred his energies to Vauxhall.

In a secondary sense their songs were composed for the private performance of amateurs. It was usual to publish books of songs 'Sung at Vauxhall' (or elsewhere), so that those institutions served as advertisement agents for publishers just as modern Ballad Concerts do, and the fact of course was instrumental in helping to keep the songs simple.

As regards subject the songs may be grouped under four heads; Love Songs, Patriotic Songs, Descriptive Songs (such as Shield's 'The Wolf,' or Hook's 'Blackbird') and Hunting or Sporting Songs.

The Love-Songs reproduced the imagery of the quasi-classical pastoral. Strephon, Damon, Delia and Chloe were the stock lay-figures of every lyric maker, and the sighs and sorrows of the male section and the kindness or unkindness of the female one were juggled with in what I may call an infinitely monotonous variety.

'The Thorn,' by Shield, is a pure example of the first type of love melody, a strophic song in which the same tune is repeated to its second verse.

Hook's 'Hush every breeze' is another example of the same kind of subject, but musically it is more developed, since it is written in a Rondo form.

Shield is the more direct, blunt, and sturdy personality, Hook the more graceful and winning.

['The Thorn' and 'Hush every breeze' were then sung.]

In looking through an old book of Shield's songs for the purposes of this lecture, I was getting rather tired of the perpetual easy and diatonic melody, when my eye fell upon a page liberally sprinkled with accidentals. It was a Canzonet called 'Relenting Delia,' the words of which are:

Now let the swelling music rise
And vibrate on the gale;
Let enharmonicks reach the skies,
And happy moments hail.
Let sweet Euterpe not disdain
Her silver harp to bring;
And let her modulated strain
To rapture tune each string.

Evidently the word 'enharmonicks' caught Shield's fancy, and led him into his little escapade in chromaticism. But although the escapade seems mild enough, he felt bound to apologise for it, and did so in two notes, one at the head and one at the foot of his score. First he says:

'It is not usual to introduce enharmonick transitions in the modulation of a short air, but the words of this could not well be expressed otherwise, and the practice of it may amuse youthful curiosity.'

And below he adds:

'The skilful harmonist might add many notes to the accompaniment, but if they were printed, the number of accidentals would be troublesome to read and difficult to play by those for whom the composition is intended.'

I may add that as the written accompaniment consisted of a bare bass, I have added a good many notes to it, but whether in the manner of a 'skilful harmonist' or otherwise is for you to judge. At any rate, I hope you have sufficient youthful curiosity to be amused by it.

[The song 'Relenting Delia' was then sung.]

I also want you to hear one song by Hook, of the descriptive kind, which illustrates a very pretty poetic idea with which we can sympathise at the moment. It is the cry of primroses in the streets, bringing the feeling of Spring into London. Please notice how daintily the tune fits the poetic idea, and the charm with which it glides into a change of time (2-4 to 6-4), and makes the traditional flower-call into a refrain.

[Hook's Primrose song (written 1800) was then sung.]

Patriotic Songs have a greater interest because they were a more direct expression of the spirit of the time. Practically all of them took the form of extolling England's unrivalled greatness, her supremacy by land and sea, in fact the 'Rule, Britannia' spirit. They performed the kind offices now undertaken by the Jingo Press of keeping up everyone's spirits, no matter how appearances might be against them.

In the last decade of the 18th century, England gradually became more and more isolated. From being one member of a confederacy against the new French Republic, she became alone against practically a confederacy of Europe. She was standing entirely upon the defensive, beaten back to the defence of her own coast-line, yet we never find a suggestion of failure in the songs of the time, and a tone which would otherwise be merely blatant and vulgar has a touch of heroism when we remember that it is the outcome of a real spirit of unswerving stedfastness which was ultimately justified in Trafalgar and Waterloo.

This fact (the reality of spirit and its ultimate justification) ought to make you listen with sympathy to the next song, Shield's 'Old England's a Lion.'

Musically it is quite worthy of the spirit it represents. It is not, like Braham's 'Death of Nelson,' a washy tune clinging for its existence to the sentiment of the words. It has muscle and sinew, energy and action in itself, and if our patriotic music had never dropped any lower than this we should have a clean record to show.

['Old England's a Lion' was then sung.]

While discussing the song-writers of this generation there is one man, not an Englishman, who must be named, because he wrote a number of English songs for English people and also because I want to compare some of his songs with those of the native writers. He needs no introduction to you. Joseph Haydn consciously adopted something of the English style in setting English words as songs, just as he adopted something of the style of Handel (so suited to English taste) in writing his oratorios, 'The Creation' and 'The Seasons.'

But there is a greater subtlety of expression in his melodies, a more finished art in his accompaniments, than his English contemporaries could achieve or wanted to achieve. He appeals to a more refined public, not the public of Vauxhall who delighted in tight-rope dancers and fireworks as well as in music and drama, but people of greater sensibility, to use Jane Austen's characteristic phrase. Indeed, 'My mother bids me bind my hair' is a song which one can imagine Marianne Dashwood lingering over at her pianoforte when she was suffering all the exquisite sensations of Willoughby's departure. It has all the tenderness and romance compatible with delicacy and elegance.

That song we are not going to give you. I take it that it is too well-known by you all to require more than a passing reference. But instead you are to hear two other songs by Haydn, 'O tuneful voice,' which gives as good an instance of romantic sensibility, and 'High on the giddy, bending mast,' which is simply an attempt to reproduce the prevalent patriotism which Shield and, before him, Dibdin had given voice to.

When Haydn visited England in 1791, Shield said that he learned more from being in his company during a four days' trip to the country than he had learned during four years of the rest of his life. One may well believe it when one compares the style of 'O tuneful voice' with that of Shield's 'Relenting Delia.'

Shield's enharmonic modulations, which he wrote with a mixture of pride and shame, are comparatively stiff when all is done. He is so obviously conscious of them, and writing them, as he said, for 'the amusement of youthful curiosity.' Haydn's modulations are thoroughly a part of his expression, and as with the harmony, so the melody has a freedom of rhythm which is quite beyond that of Shield or Hook.

['O tuneful voice' was then sung.]

In the other song Haydn is going out of his own field in extolling British patriotism. We may naturally feel some distrust of patriotic songs written for us by foreigners; but I think it is not altogether British prejudice which makes one prefer the sturdy melodies of this kind by Dibdin and Shield. Haydn's song is very cleverly done: he keeps the rhythm everywhere alive and makes the declamation forcible. But it is too fluent; there is a touch of the manufacturer about it, and there is nothing more contemptible than manufactured patriotism.

['High on the giddy, bending mast' was then sung.]

Early in the 19th century the public gardens of Vauxhall, Ranelagh, &c., decayed. Vauxhall, indeed, lingered for a time, but became less and less a part of normal national life. Of the generation after Shield and Hook, the English song-writer of the greatest consequence was Henry Rowley Bishop, 1786-1855. His career was primarily an operatic one, and the operatic influence, combined with the fact that his musical impulse was of a slender kind, gave an artificiality to his work which places it on a much lower level than that of the men whom we have been considering. Many of his songs are known to you: 'Bid me discourse' and 'Should he upbraid' are typical. One finds a melody which starts fairly well, and which soon comes to a point when the composer's inspiration is exhausted, and where he tries to cover the fact by the use of rather foolish coloratura. English composers since Purcell have never been able to manage coloratura well, it is not a part of their nature, and almost invariably it has the effect of something stuck on to their original idea, instead of being a part of it.

I am not going to linger over the innumerable songs of Balfe (1808-1888), because I do not wish to waste your time over merely amiable commonplaces. Instead, I want to point out one or two distinct lines which the development of English song followed. Perhaps the most curious of these is found in the songs of Henry Russell (1812-1900). It should be said that all his songs belong definitely to the first half of the 19th century, since he retired from public life in 1865. He, like Dibdin of the century before, wrote his songs chiefly for his own singing, and gave public entertainments in which they formed a principal part. Even more than Dibdin, he must have relied upon his personality for the success of his songs.

There are some, like 'Woodman, spare that tree,' which are just about on the lukewarm level of Balfe's 'Arrow and the song'; there are others, like 'The mother's Bible,' which appeal to that extraordinary capacity for revelling in an unreal sentiment which is always present among audiences. A verse of 'The mother's Bible' (there are four of them, all set to the same tune) deserves to be quoted:

'This book is all that's left me now,
Tears will unbidden start,
With faltering lip and throbbing brow
I press it to my heart.
For many generations past
Here is our family tree,
My mother's hands this Bible claspt,
She dying gave to me.'

There was a curious mixture of good and bad songs in some of the collections that were popular. 'Adelaida' probably gained admittance merely as a sentimental song on the same terms as 'The mother's Bible,' and 'Der Erlkonig' appealed to a dramatic instinct which was equally aroused by such lurid effusions as 'The gambler's wife,' another song by Henry Russell. My attention was first drawn to these songs by an article in Grove's 'Dictionary,' which spoke of Russell as 'unsurpassed in this type of song.'

'The gambler's wife' is the story of an unhappy lady who describes her sorrows in three verses. At the end of each verse the clock strikes the hour. She and her child die at the end of the third verse, and in the fourth:

The gambler came at last,
But all was o'er.
Dread silence reigned around,
The clock struck four.

Every detail has its musical description in the accompaniment; she thinks she hears his step and the rattle of the dice-box (though why a gambler should wander about rattling a dice-box is not explained!); the sign-board creaks, and a figure taken from Beethoven's fifth Symphony does the creaking; the winds moan to chromatic scales, and the lattice flaps to agitated chords.

[The song was then sung.]

The fact that English song-writers had got more and more out of touch with contemporary poetry had cut them off from any fresh sources of inspiration. Comparing England and Germany, there seems at first sight to be very little reason why Englishmen should not have transmuted their poetry into song with the same eagerness, if not with the same genius, with which German musicians, and foremost among them Schubert, fell upon the poetry of Goethe, Schiller, Uhland, and later of Heine. There was in England a remarkable poetic outpouring. The lyrics of Burns remained more or less untouched by the musicians; there was the group of poets with Wordsworth at its head, of whom Matthew Arnold said that almost all his best work is packed into the decade between 1798 and 1808; there were Byron, Keats, and Shelley. S. S. Wesley wrote a number of songs, but was too indolent to try to impress himself upon the public as a song-writer. Church music and fishing occupied his more serious hours; the songs are merely the offshoots of his idle ones. Two of them you are to hear. A gentle evening song, 'Silently, silently,' has a beautiful melody; and in the pianoforte introduction there is a phrase which perhaps is a conscious reminiscence of 'Lead me, Lord' from one of Wesley's best-known anthems.

['Silently, silently' was then sung.]

The other song is a setting of Byron's paraphrase of the Psalm 'By the waters of Babylon,' and perhaps in the fact that Wesley gravitated to words by Shelley and Byron in more than one instance, we find his recognition of the fact that song-writing should spring from the poetic feeling of the time, and the somewhat laconic attempt to act upon it. This song is remarkable for Wesley's favourite use of striking and chromatic harmonies, which are appropriately used, and the genuineness of its feeling is beyond doubt.

There is one man who forms an interesting link with the older English tradition, and whose style shows genuine signs of developing in accordance with modern requirements into the form of song in which singer and accompanist are colleagues, rather than master and servant. Edward James Loder (1810-1865) had the genuine spirit of the song-writer, and if all his work is not on a very high level, we may put that down partly to the fact that fairly early in his career he made a considerable success, and then entered into an agreement with a publishing firm to supply a new song or other composition every week, which he did for some time. A good many have the taint of the shop upon them; such once favourite things as 'The Outlaw' and 'The Diver' are on their way towards 'The gambler's wife'; but so far as I know he never reached that goal, and Henry Russell therefore remains 'unsurpassed.' There are a great many of his songs which maintain the standard of pure melody of Hook and Shield, and are quite spontaneous, if not particularly lofty. An excellent case in point is 'There 's a light in her sparkling eye.' You are to hear the best song he ever wrote, a song which is so extraordinarily artistic in its treatment of the pianoforte part, that one could not be surprised if it were proved to have been written by a much greater master. It is, curiously enough, a translation of one of the songs from the 'Müllerlieder,' but it is so good that I feel sure that it was written without a knowledge of Schubert's setting. It is called 'I heard a brooklet gushing, the 'Wohin' of the 'Müllerlieder.' The freedom of the pianoforte writing, the excellent point with which the idea of the brook is always kept before the hearer in the pianoforte part, the fluency of the melody, and the grace and finish of the whole are what make it so remarkable. For purposes of comparison you shall hear Schubert's 'Wohin' first, and Loder's 'Brooklet' afterwards. It is pleasant to end with a masterpiece.

[Both songs were then sung.]

Mr. Lewis, in moving a vote of thanks to Mr. Colles, made an interesting speech.

Reviews.

The Romance of the Fiddle. By E. van der Straeten.

[Rebman, Limited.]

Mr. van der Straeten, in his latest work, has done valuable service by collecting into one interesting volume information on his subject which before was almost hopelessly scattered among books, journals and diaries of the periods with which he deals.

The instruments themselves of the violin family, and their evolution from the crwth and viol, under the hands of Duiffoprugcar and Gasparo da Salo, are concisely dealt with; the general development of instrumental music from vocal compositions, such as the early madrigals, which were described as 'Apt for Viols and Voices,' is followed; instruction books from the earliest known, that by Gasparo Zanetti, published at Milan in 1645, to the 'tutors' of the early 19th century are dealt with; and from them, as well as from the instrumental music of successive periods, the gradual growth of violin technique is traced; and, above all, a vivid picture is drawn of musical life in England from the time of Charles II. (before the Restoration there was no such thing as a public concert in London) to about the end of the Georgian era.

Mr. van der Straeten is thoroughly at home in his subject, and the old composers and violinists of whom he writes are evidently among his dearest friends. Yet we miss one name we had hoped to find; surely one of the greatest strides ever made in the progress of technique is that from Corelli's Sonatas, Op. V., to Bach's Sonatas for violin without accompaniment.

It has been impossible before to get as comprehensive a view as is now offered us of the very interesting late Jacobean period, when Thomas Britton, the small-coal man, gave concerts in a loft, at which the performers were the best musicians of the time and the audience included people of the highest rank; when a man who wanted music must go to a tavern and pay his sixpence to hear it, for no concert room had yet been built. The following generation, being better catered for in such matters, seems to have looked down on the methods of its predecessors, for Hawkins in his account of John Humphries, a worthy English composer of String concertos (whom, by the way, our Author does not mention), speaks contemptuously of those who 'were used to recreate themselves with music at ale-house clubs, and places of vulgar resort,' and adds a foot-note beginning, 'To such readers as are interested in the knowledge of low manners it may be some gratification to mention that there were concerts of this kind at the following places.'

Mr. van der Straeten intersperses his remarks with many direct quotations, one of which, from 'The Court of King James,' is so innocent that it must be given here. After a description of the imitation which a clever servant of Sir Thomas Monson could give of the sound of the tabor and pipe, there follows, 'to this musick, would Mrs. Turner, the young ladies, and some of the gig, dance ever after supper; and the old lady, who loved that musick as well as her daughters, would sit and laugh. She could scarce sit for laughing.'

The illustrations, which are excellent, include portraits of the younger Banister, Britton, Playford, Mace, Geminiani, Leopold Mozart, and many others, as well as facsimiles of interesting title-pages and specimens of early instrumental parts printed 'consort-way.' The get-up of the book deserves a word of praise: the volume would adorn any library.

Pavane, for the Organ. By Bernard Johnson.
Festal March, for the Organ. By A. Storr.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

If originality cannot be claimed for Mr. Johnson's 'Pavane,' it has yet some points of interest, and should prove popular with a concert-hall audience. It will also tax to some extent the ability of the player in giving a clear interpretation of the combined and contrasted themes.

The outstanding feature of the 'Festal March' seems to be unusual simplicity. The themes can hardly be considered either strong or interesting, while nothing by way of development is attempted. The piece, however, may be played on a small organ by anyone having a moderate command of the instrument, and for these reasons may be of use on occasion.

The Universal Music and Dramatic Directory. English edition of the 'Annuaire des Artistes.' Edited by H. Bonnaire.

[20, High Holborn, W.C.]

The above comprehensive title is no vain and idle boast. It might be called the musical directory of the world, with special reference to France and England. The volume supplies 5 lbs. 4 ozs. of detailed information which, one would think, it must be a life-work to keep up to date.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis. Set to music in the key of G. By H. A. Chambers.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This is a well-written service, within the powers of any average church choir. Mr. Chambers has followed lines familiar enough, but has expressed himself clearly both in the vocal treatment and the harmonic scheme. The organ accompaniment follows the voice parts, except where unison passages occur, while relief is given by short organ phrases. The last verse of the Magnificat would no doubt sound well as a quartet.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

Sir,—I wish I could agree with Dr. Grattan Flood and Mr. Froggatt that the instrument depicted on the Ullard Cross represents 'a harp without a fore-pillar,' for, as being unique in Britain, it would be of far greater interest to musical antiquaries. But I cannot make it out to be so, because, when standing beneath the Cross and looking up at the ancient sculpture, the swell of the front support or pillar is quite evident, even more so than in the direct photograph; that is why it appears so distinctly in a rubbing. I admit that it is not so robust a feature as the upper curve or head, and in the actual instrument that would not be necessary; for the head carried the tuning pins and required depth and solidity, but the front support needed only sufficient stiffness to keep the upper and lower ends of the instrument from drawing together under the straight tension of the strings, which was also relieved by the soundboard, which partially covered the back. (See Brit. Mus. MSS. Vit. F. xi.)

My remarks must have been misunderstood if it was thought that I admitted that the earliest Irish 'harps' wanted the fore pillar, for I have no reason at all to believe it; nor can I allow that 'names matter little,' when the wrong application of names causes more worry and trouble to the conscientious investigator than anything else.

Let my correspondents compare the accompanying photograph—one of the excellent series I obtained at Ullard—with the engraving in Bunting's book: they will observe that the short vertical piece, shown by him at the bottom of the instrument to the right, is undoubtedly continued upward to the wedged-shaped incision in the head above, which in the Brit. Mus. MS. (already referred to) is represented as a dragon's open mouth. This line, from its position, cannot be a string, but is either a front support or the outer side of a soundboard covering the whole back of the instrument, of which the somewhat mutilated carving on the Ballyogan Cross at Duiske Abbey seems to afford an example.

To put a practical question, which I am sure my hospitable friend, Mr. Patrick O'Leary (whom I discovered after my researches at Ullard), will appreciate, How were these C or E shaped instruments playable without some support between the upper and lower parts of the frame?

Sir Samuel Ferguson had his doubts, and, in a letter to Dr. Petrie, thus expressed them: 'If it be a harp he plays, how could the strings be fastened as they would seem to be on such a frame?' And with this I entirely agree. For though the ancient Assyrian and Egyptian harps were without the front pillar, like the present Soung of Burmah and the Nanga of N. Africa, they either still retained the shape of the hunting bow from which they were derived, or assumed the form of an acute angle, being composed of a stiff rod inserted firmly into a hollow sound-box, between which the strings were stretched so far as the resistance of the frame permitted. With camel-gut or horse-hair strings a certain amount of tension is possible, though even then the unsupported ends have a tendency to draw together; but with metal strings (which the Irish used) any effective tension on such a frame is impracticable. In my attempt to explain the true character of these ancient carvings therefore, I am only desirous of showing that the Keltic sculptors did not portray impossible instruments, but correct representations of their historic Crots.

As for the example on the Durrow Cross, Dr. Grattan Flood, in his 'Story of the Harp,' calls it 'a six-stringed cruit with a bridge and a bow': here I think he is right (except for the bow). But when he asserts—as he now does—that it is a triangular harp like that at Nigg in Scotland, I cannot believe him. Those interested can see fine illustrations of the Durrow and other crosses in Miss Margaret Stokes's 'High Crosses of Durrow and Castledermot,' all showing a front support to the instrument.

The allusion to the harp in the famous 10th century MS. of Caedmon's Paraphrase (Bodleian Library, Oxford) is unfortunate, for the MS. is recognised English work. It was written and illuminated three hundred years after Caedmon's day; and we are expressly told by his contemporary, Bede, that Caedmon did not play the harp—of course not, good Kelt that he was. In conclusion, may I remind my correspondents that my lecture and paper were on the origin of the Clarsech, and any differences of opinion we may have as to the construction of these quadrangular Crots cannot affect my main conclusion—that the triangular Irish harp, which we know as the Clarsech, owes its origin to the Northern or Scandinavian instrument, Gerbert's 'Cythara Anglica.'

Thanking you, Sir, for your courtesy in allowing me so full a reply.—Yours faithfully, Francis W. Galpin.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

Sir,—Mr. Corder's letter in your March issue deserves an answer from me, if only on account of its extremely courteous manner of controversy. I say 'if only' because, when one man states a firm conviction clearly and a second man denies it in toto, there is generally little profit in prolonging the mutual contradictions. But Mr. Corder gives chapter and verse for his beliefs, and gives them with such absence of irritation that I believe he may be interested in knowing why his premises are not universally accepted. Mr. Corder's case is—I hope I put it fairly—(1) that everything which we learn (until originality appears at the age of forty) is learnt from some one else; (2) that we begin to make for progress at the point where the last progressive left off; and (3) that originality manifests itself so late in life (with Beethoven and Wagner at forty, with Verdi at sixty) that the previous years are best spent in assimilating and modelling on the best work of the great men. These three propositions are, I think, just nductions from Mr. Corder's argument.

Now with the backbone of this argument I do, of course, agree. It is simply the doctrine of evolution—that progress is continuous, from an inferior to a superior condition. I desire such progress as strongly as anyone. But I conceive it is being retarded in England because of the tendencies of the two teachers who get the pick of the talented pupils. The one tends to make pupils write like Beethoven and Brahms, till, as I maintain, their individuality is strangled; the other to make pupils so extraordinarily skilful in technique that they can write exactly like anyone whose name you may take out of a hat.

Mr. Corder chooses a literary parallel and asks if I did not learn to say 'da-da' from my mother. Certainly, and from ner also I learnt my notes. We must all learn the axioms and conditions of any subject from another person, and that point is not in the issue. The question is, What is the best method of fostering my originality if I decide to aim at creative work? Would Mr. Corder approve of a young man who showed real promise as a creator in literature being set the task of writing passages of English in the style of Milton, Shakespeare, Ruskin, Carlyle, Walter Pater, and Stevenson—still less in that of one only of them? Assuming as a miracle that he says 'yes,' and prefers the one exclusive model, then what writer will he nominate? Is it to be an old writer, or the biggest discoverable recent one, or one somewhere between the two? Surely what a man has to say is so indissolubly linked with his manner of saying it, that if we had taken Ruskin and Walter Pater and forced them to do exercises in the manner of Macaulay (or anyone else) till the age of forty, then we should almost certainly have lacked in English literature the priceless aroma of two beautiful styles. Yet countless composition students of to-day are glutted with Beethoven in season and out of season, and Sir Charles Stanford declares 'it is the only way to get at the root of the matter.' Beethoven, Sir, may be as great as ten Shakespeares; but neither the one nor the other is the last word in his art, and the man who is going to take us nearer heaven in music or literature has not got to begin where these two giants left off.

The root of my complaint against this school of teaching, then, is that it destroys the laws of evolution by ignoring continuity; and I claim that the same charge holds against the 'technique' school. You may analyse the work of Strauss, Ravel, Debussy and even (if you can) of that arch-humorist Schönberg; and with a master who is a genius you may learn (as Mr. Corder's pupils learn) to write like any one of them. But the essence of evolution is grafting, and I have heard no English composition of this school, though some of its representatives must be nearly forty, which shows any clear sign of having enlarged the mainland by the acquisition and absorption of new territory. But perhaps they are waiting until they are sixty?—Yours faithfully,

Your Reviewer.

PRESENTATION TO MR. ALBERT VISETTI.

On March 19, Mr. Albert Visetti, the well-known professor of singing, was presented with a bronze bust of himself executed by Mr. Leonard Merryfield. The presentation, which took place at the Royal College of Music, was made on behalf of numerous past and present pupils, to whom the distinguished professor had endeared himself. The address in the album accompanying the bust was signed by Madame Kirkby Lunn, Miss Phyllis Lett, Miss Agnes Nicholls, and many other well-known singers. Sir Hubert Parry made the presentation on behalf of the subscribers.

Obituary.

ALBERT LISTER PEACE,

Born January 26, 1844, died March 14, 1912.

We much regret to have to record the death of the eminent organist, Dr. Albert Lister Peace, which took place at his residence, 'Dalmore,' Merrilocks Road, Blundellsands, Liverpool, on March 14. He had been ill for ten days, and the end was sudden. His last recital was given at St. George's Hall, Liverpool, on March 2.

Dr. Peace was born at Huddersfield, on January 26, 1844. When he was in his ninth year he became organist of the Parish Church of Holmfirth. Later he served in this capacity at Springfield Chapel, Dewsbury; St. Thomas's Church, Huddersfield; Brunswick Street Chapel, Huddersfield; Providence Place Chapel, Cleckheaton. In 1865 he removed to Glasgow, and became organist of Trinity Congregational Church, Glasgow, and in 1870 he became organist to the University. In 1878 he was elected to Glasgow Cathedral. He took his Mus. Bac. degree at Oxford in 1870, and the Mus. Doc. degree in 1875. In 1897 he succeeded the late Mr. W. T. Best as city organist to Liverpool, a post that involved regular recitals on the fine organ of St. George's Hall. His great executive powers led to extensive demands for his services all over the Kingdom, and he now became one of the most famous solo players of his day. Although he was chiefly celebrated as an executant, he made some worthy contributions to organ literature. Amongst his compositions for the instrument there are three sonatas, two concert fantasies, and some service music, and many organ arrangements. A book of organ recital programme notes reveal his capacity as an analyst and critic.

We regret also to have to report the following deaths:

Mr. John Large, on March 14, at Tottenham, in his seventieth year. He was once the possessor of a pure, counter-tenor voice said to have been without a rival in the country. He was a lay-vicar at Westminster Abbey from 1875 to 1878, afterwards returning and retaining his connection until a few years ago.

Miss Kate Wynne (Mrs. Henry Matthison), of New Westminster, British Columbia, a favourite contralto vocalist in Liverpool and Wales a generation ago, on March 9. She was a sister of Madame Edith Wynne, the well-known singer, and of Mr. Llewellyn Wynne, secretary of the Liverpool Welsh Choral Union.

Mr. Max Blume, the well-known teacher of the pianoforte, at Harrogate, on January 27. He was born in 1849, received his chief musical education at Leipsic, and after serving in the army during the Franco-Prussian War, came to Harrogate in 1872.

Mr. John William Parker, of Hessle House, Ewell, Surrey, on February 5, at the age of seventy-eight. He was a pupil and life-long friend of the late Dr. E. J. Hopkins. From 1876 to 1883, Mr. Parker was organist of Ewell Parish Church, and formerly was at Gray's Inn Chapel.

Mr. John Maude Crament, Mus. Bac. Oxon., on March 4, aged sixty-six. He was organist and choirmaster of St. Paul's, Vicarage-gate, Kensington, had conducted several Societies, and was an assiduous composer.

SIR ALEXANDER MACKENZIE ON LISZT.

The second and third of the lectures given by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, at the Royal Institution, which took place on February 10 and 17, were on the subject of Liszt. By his long personal acquaintance and friendship with Liszt, Sir Alexander was well qualified to describe his life and life-work with sympathy and insight, and to throw many illuminating sidelights upon his character. From the quantity of interesting matter with which the lecturer compelled his hearers' attention from start to finish it is difficult to devise a summary or to pick a selection. The familiar biography was outlined by comment rather than by statement.

In treating of Liszt's boyhood the lecturer produced a curiosity in the shape of the first edition, published in 1823, of the set of Variations which Diabelli induced a number of well-known men to write upon a waltz of his own composition. Variation No. 9 was by Liszt, then a boy of eleven. Beethoven, Hummel, Czerny, and Moscheles made contributions, that of Beethoven being afterwards expanded into the famous 'thirty-three.'

The frequent visits to London made by Liszt during adolescence, and his growing distaste for the life of a virtuoso, introduced the period when the fierce opposition which has raged round the name of Liszt, until recently, began to manifest itself in both England and Germany. By this time (1840) Liszt had opened up a new era in pianoforte playing, by the publication of his transcription of Paganini's Capricii for violin in the first instance, transcriptions of Beethoven and Berlioz Symphonies and Schubert songs, the 'Années de Pélerinage,' 'Grandes études,' and other original works. 'I am of opinion,' the lecturer said, 'that these operatic and other fantasies, with their amazing invention of passage-work, their ingenious dovetailing of themes, and their inexhaustible fancy, are efforts of genius, although many of them have gone out of vogue along with their subjects. Most of them owe their existence to the fact that it was his amiable habit of offering them as musical homage to the prominent composers of the countries he happened to be in. Some were written with the deliberate intention of popularising the music of comparatively unknown composers.' Sir Alexander then proceeded to deal with the songs that belong to this period. Before turning to Liszt's life at Weimar after his permanent abandonment of the concert-platform, the lecturer pointed out the usefulness to art of his virtuoso career: 'Before opening a new volume . . . . . let us remember that he had been carrying the fame of the greatest dead and living composers of his time into every country. The reputation of some of them was purely local—Berlioz and Chopin in Paris, Schumann in Leipsic, not to speak of Beethoven (the spread of whose fame was his special care), Schubert and Weber. Liszt was the only one who persistently brought the names of his contemporaries before the public during his meteoric flights. This was done without a break for twenty years.'

Coming to the Weimar period, the lecturer was naturally brought to the consideration of Liszt's discovery and advocacy of Wagner's works, 'in which he had practically the whole world against him.' A number of historical incidents and extracts from correspondence exemplified Liszt's generosity and patience in these relations, and his extraordinary forbearance under the obloquy which his sacrifices to Wagner brought upon him. One of his letters to Wagner has an additional interest with regard to his own compositions: 'I have had to hear and read so much about them that I have no opinion on the subject, and continue to work only from persistent inner conviction and without any claims to recognition or approval. Several of my intimate friends, for example Joachim, and formerly Schumann and others, have shown themselves strange, doubtful and unfavourable towards my musical creations. I owe them no grudge on that account, and cannot retaliate because I take a sincere and comprehensive interest in their work.'

'Liszt came to Weimar,' said Sir Alexander, 'with a couple of personal projects in his mind. One was the completion of a Symphony inspired by Dante. The other was the development of a new art-form, the Symphonic-poem, for the first example of which he had already chosen his subject from Victor Hugo. Sneers at the idea of his wanting to compose at all, and doubts as to his ability either to score for or to conduct an orchestra, were freely distributed. That he could do these things supremely well was very soon proved.' . . . . 'As each of the twelve Symphonic-poems appeared, hostile criticism was liberally poured upon it. But while he strongly resented any depreciation of Wagner's compositions, he took all that was levelled against his own almost as a matter of course. . . . . Briefly, the situation became more and more strained and disagreeable. His influence at the small Court gradually waned, and the turbulent Weimar period closed amid the perfect charivari of cat-calls and abuse which attended the production of the opera of his friend and pupil, Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagdad."'

The lecturer here entered into an interesting review of the great secular works written by Liszt during his Weimar period, and the sacred works that followed upon his retirement and entry into the Church.

He then described the complete change that had come over the situation during the seven years of retirement. 'Wagner had conquered; his own progressive tendencies in every direction were at last accepted, and above all his inspiring presence was greatly missed. "Everything awaits you here," wrote the Duke from Weimar: a little house was prepared for him, and there he lived for a certain number of months each year, surrounded by eager pupils and friends. The last chapter, as he called it, was devoted to tuition, the encouragement of his youngsters, looking over their manuscripts, assisting them by advice and solid help to positions in life. "If I do anything for myself," he once said to me, "it is in the very early morning," and as a matter of fact he was at his desk at four o'clock in the morning in summer-time. . . . During these years he lived a life of utmost simplicity. Probably his entire income could hardly have represented more than £400 per annum! Yet when he travelled with his pupils their expenses were invariably paid by himself!'

Sir Alexander then devoted a section of his lecture to the persistent and devoted efforts on behalf of Liszt's works made in England by his friend and pupil, Walter Bache: 'the one doughty champion here, who carried on the fight, against overpowering odds, fearlessly and with unquenchable ardour.' For exhibition at both lectures, many interesting portraits, relics, and manuscripts were generously lent by his sister, Miss Margaret Bache.

Although every aspect of Liszt's career and works was dealt with in an individual and arresting manner, the most notable portion of the lectures arose out of Sir Alexander Mackenzie's personal contact with the master. Speaking of the time when the Weimar period was drawing to a close, and referring to his boyhood spent in Sondershausen (Schwarzburg), he said, 'It is odd that two small ducal residences, almost marching upon each other, should have been the centres of all that was new in music at the time. Famous concerts took place at Sondershausen on Sunday afternoons in the open air, in a park called the "Loh," and I remember well that pilgrims interested in the movement came from Leipsic (the enemy's camp) and other places to hear the musica proibita, not without considerable sacrifice of comfort, for the railways stopped at Nordhausen, a long way off. Well, I took a humble part in the performance of many of these startling works, among others the Prelude to "Tristan," both of Berlioz's Symphonies, and the tone-poems of Liszt. The very last piece I rehearsed was the "Faust" Symphony, almost fresh from the printers. After this I came to the R.A.M. here, where in those days, it need hardly be said, "they knew not Joseph."' Sir Alexander described Liszt's appearance when he first saw him at the end of 1859. They did not actually meet until about 1879. The lecturer said: 'My first meeting with him in Florence was not exactly a propitious one for me, but as the little story only serves to throw a stronger light upon the man's boundless good-nature, I may tell it.

'The present occupant of the Chair of Music in the University of Edinburgh, Professor Niecks, was then gathering material for his justly famous "Life of Chopin," and had had some months previously several interviews with Liszt in Weimar, when Liszt amiably gave him much valuable information. My friend, Dr. Niecks, requested me to ask Liszt a question or two, in order to fill up some trifling blanks. When I ventured to approach Liszt on the subject he was evidently ruffled, and dismissed it curtly and glowered at me. But much worse was to follow at the luncheon table shortly afterwards, when I was telling a musical anecdote to some of my neighbours, who were amused, and laughed. Now Liszt, sitting opposite, had caught the name of his adored pupil, Tausig, and, completely misunderstanding the drift of what I had been saying, said sharply, "No, Tausig would never have done that." Our host, who had heard it all, at once defended me: "But, Master, Mackenzie never said anything of the sort." Thereupon Liszt leaned forward and apologised: "I am sorry I misunderstood; you must excuse me, I am a little deaf." But all the same he did not thaw, and seemed put out when he left us to pay some visits. So was I. Although it was understood that I was to join the company at supper, I thought discretion the better part of valour, and stayed away. My surprise was great when, during the course of the evening, I received a hasty message from Madame Hillebrand (our hostess) to "Come up immediately. Liszt has been asking for you several times." I say "come up," because I lived on the floor immediately beneath.

'Now comes the point of the story. The good old Master had evidently been thinking it over, had come to the conclusion that he had done me an injustice, and consequently had been tormenting himself for the rest of the afternoon.

'It seems that almost his first words on entering the drawing-room were "Wo ist der Schotte?" (Where is the Scotchman?) "I want to see his music." "Well, yes, certainly, Master, but better wait until after supper." But he persisted; and nothing would serve until a four-hand edition of a couple of my then recently published Scottish Rhapsodies was produced, and the first one played. After this he went to supper, but no sooner was the meal over than he insisted upon playing the other one; hence the message. And when I arrived upon the scene I found his two celebrated pupils, Sophie Menter and Buonamici, at work on No. 2, with Liszt beside them turning over the pages.

'. . . I have every reason to believe that these incidents had a considerable influence upon his acceptance of the invitation from Mr. Littleton and Walter Bache to come to London.

'On several occasions his friend and champion, Bache, had pressed him to visit London, but Liszt had always gently declined. When the final invitation to be present at a performance of "St. Elizabeth" by the Novello Choir was offered he wrote, among other things, "I will come, I owe him something" (Ich schulde Ihm etwas). Now, he owed me nothing! But in all this you have the character of this extraordinary man; castigating himself, as it were, for a fancied slight to a young musician of no account whatever.

'I remember one morning walking about alone with him in the large conservatory at Westwood House (Sydenham), where stood the famous Roubilliac statue of Handel. He stopped before it with a "Hah! the old man!" as if recognising an acquaintance. "I used to know a Fugue of his: it is thirty years since I played it: let me see, it began so"—and he finished the piece without further effort.

'Fortunate were they who had a chance of catching him in those moods!'

In his concluding remarks Sir Alexander said:

'Hungarian Liszt's artistic standard should not be measured with a German tape. He belonged to a race endowed with different—almost opposite—characteristics.

'During the years of travel, when he so early in life "was found guilty of success" (as Carlyle puts it), he acquired the widest outlook, and learned to appreciate the essential qualities of the music of many lands. But the resulting sympathy and eclectic generosity of thought seem not to have been accounted to his credit by the Chauvinists of his day. Whatever changes in music he wrought—and they are many—he never sought to destroy anything. He added and built, logically lengthening the identical lines which Beethoven was drawing in his latest and greatest works. What Liszt did evidently came to stay: it has remained to inspire many men who have carried those lines much further.

'On the whole it is a tardy recognition which the Master receives a quarter of a century after death. Even now, I venture to say, there are some great works—such as "Christus," for one—which have as yet either been inadequately presented, or are still unknown to the public and to a large number of musicians.

'My pleasant and grateful task has been to offer you some faint idea of the vast extent of the life-labour, of the nature, the nobility and modesty of a great genius, whom to know was to love.'

The lecture on 'Russian music' had the enthusiastic co-operation of the Hans Wessely String Quartette; and in connection with the subject now under notice, the following illustrations of Liszt's music were given by students of the Royal Academy of Music:

'ELIJAH' ON THE STAGE: ORATORIO AS MUSIC-DRAMA.

By Francis E. Barrett.

The removal of the ban placed by the Lord Chamberlain on the representation of works of sacred import on the stage has made it possible to carry out a plan of giving Mendelssohn's oratorio of 'Elijah' as a music-drama. The work was made ready for the purpose some years ago by Mr. Harrison Frewin, and in February it was given by the Moody-Manners Opera Company at Kelly's Theatre, Liverpool. It is a very remarkable testimony to the dramatic instinct of Mendelssohn that his oratorio requires no alteration for the purpose of the stage. All that has been necessary is the omission of some of the choruses on the score of length, and an augmentation of the scene in which Jezebel incites the people to slaughter Elijah. As this portion of the work stood in the original it was felt that it was somewhat abrupt, and Mr. Frewin, after devising some words suitable to the situation, went to Mendelssohn for the music. He adapted part of the unfinished opera of 'Loreley' for the purpose. For the necessary entr'actes he also introduced some Mendelssohn numbers, the chief of them being the Andante from the Italian Symphony, which is used as an introduction to the last Act, and serves to describe Elijah's journey to the wilderness, the last scene of the music-drama. These are the most considerable additions to the stage version. The chorus, 'Then did Elijah,' is made to conclude the work logically, as the sequential numbers are more or less in the nature of an anticlimax. The oratorio is divided into three Acts, the first concluding with the injunction to Elijah to visit the Widow. The scene at the Widow's cottage at Zarapath is next given. The scene outside the Temple of Baal, the sacrifices, the coming of fire and of rain form the next Act. The third consists of the address to the people of Israel, Jezebel's protest against the teachings of Elijah, and Obadiah's warning to the Prophet of the Queen's intentions towards him. At the last scene Elijah is shown in the wilderness. Here he is discovered by his followers, and the regular numbers of the original score are preserved up to the point at which he is translated to Heaven.

When it is remembered that it has fallen to the lot of Mr. Charles Manners to invent the whole of the action that shall accompany the presentation of the oratorio as a music-drama, one becomes fully conscious of his extraordinary powers as a stage-manager. They are put in evidence from the very first chorus. The prophecy of drought is sung while the curtain is down; at its conclusion it is raised on a scene showing the desolation of the land, and the three years' drought is illustrated by the overture. With its closing bars the distressed people rush on to the stage with their appeal for help. It comes as a surprise, and at once establishes a feeling of intense impressiveness which is never once relaxed throughout the performance. The appeal of Obadiah to the people to 'rend your hearts and not your garments' assumes an entirely new complexion, and the well-known air, 'If with all your hearts,' takes on fresh meaning and a further beauty. The double-quartet is sung by the eight followers of the Prophet, and here again the perspective of the music gains. The scene appropriately closes with the Angel's command to Elijah.

Great significance is given to the whole of the scene at the Widow's cottage, and it is helped considerably by the bearing adopted by the representatives of the Prophet and the Widow. In the one devoutness is expressed, and in the other the agony of mind followed by gratitude and wonder is portrayed. There is a happy consistence by which the Widow later utters the appeal, 'Hear ye, Israel,' to the assembled people. But before that there is the scene outside the Temple of Baal. Here are shown the rival altars, the vanity of idolatry, the proof of the Divine presence, and the response to Elijah's prayer for rain preceded by the scene with the Youth. The famous number, 'Hear ye, Israel,' which opens the next Act, is sung by the Widow with the people of Israel grouped around her, and never has it produced so great an effect. The unquestionably dramatic design of the music becomes more clear, and the second half of the number stands as an appeal of increased urgency. The introduced number makes the intention of Jezebel thoroughly clear. Yet in view of the fact that the work and its meaning are so well-known, it seems something in the nature of an excrescence. The music itself, which is of different manner from that of the oratorio, is scarcely in keeping with the remainder. But again Mendelssohn's strong dramatic instinct is expressed in the air 'It is enough,' sung by Elijah in the wilderness. The trio 'Lift thine eyes,' sung by three of the people who have followed the Prophet, also fits in with the situation. At its proper place 'O rest in the Lord' is given as a message of hope from the lips of one of the people. The sequence of choruses that follow proved at the first representation a stay to the dramatic action, but they have since been abbreviated to a point that does not delay the action while preserving the original. As an introduction to the Baal scene, for which the 'Song without Words' in E major (transposed of course to E flat) was inserted, the first Baal chorus (orchestrated) has been substituted, with gain to the effect.

While naturally the first thoughts are as to the effect the oratorio makes when transferred to the stage, some consideration must be given to the manner of its presentation in detail. This is remarkably good. The company—incidentally an operatic school of extraordinary attainment and a highly-appreciated undertaking—is but small, numbering some forty voices. But it is formed of picked singers—potential operatic principals, every one—and they sang admirably. The purity of tone, its legitimacy (particularly the tenors), excellence of balance, clear articulation of the words, and extraordinary intelligence, gave an entirely new meaning to the music. The representative of the Prophet at the first performance was Mr. Graham Marr, who sang with great sonority, much dignity, and remarkable devotion; the Widow was Miss Florence Morden, who in particular gave special effect to 'Hear ye, Israel'; the contralto numbers were divided between Miss Helen Culver as the Jezebel and Miss Lily Moody as the interpreter of the music of the Angel and the singer of 'O rest in the Lord,' both doing their work in impressive fashion. The tenor music was well sung by Mr. Wilson Pembroke, and the bass music had an excellent representative in Mr. Harry Brindle. The orchestra, of a size proportionate to the dimensions of the chorus, did its work well, and Herr Richard Eckhold conducted with enthusiasm. It was to be noted that he inclined towards the slower tempi in many of the choruses, but wisely, as it made the changes more telling. In regard to the attitude of the audience a judicious precedent was established from the first, since at Mr. Manners's suggestion all applause was reserved until after the curtain had fallen. It increased immensely the impressiveness of an impressive production.

MR. DENHOF'S OPERA SEASON.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

MANCHESTER.

The high hopes formed of the future of opera in Manchester received rather a rude shock during the recent Denhof 'Operatic Festival,' conducted by Balling and Cortolezis; the public support was much less than for the 'Ring' dramas a year ago. Gloomy tidings had reached us from Hull of a deficit of over £1,000, and the loss on the week's run here cannot have been much, if any, short of that figure. The prices charged for 'Orpheus,' 'Elektra,' 'Flying Dutchman,' 'Tristan' and 'Meistersinger' were no higher than for the great tetralogy, yet that series was profitable and the recent one disastrous. It almost forces the conclusion that in many quarters it must have been considered that the 'Ring' dramas were things which no person with pretensions to culture could afford to miss without losing social caste; or perhaps it was the glamour of the 'Ring' which drew such crowded houses. But after all we are a business and not a leisured community; support for all our artistic enterprises is drawn mainly from people in business, and apparently that is not yet of sufficient strength to enable an outside venture of this sort to claim adequate support in the full tide of our winter's music. The Hallé concert audience was largely depleted of its regular patrons, who on that evening went across the road to 'Elektra'; but on the last night a remarkable performance of 'Meistersinger' drew only a moderate house, whilst a distinguished prima donna and her husband packed the Free Trade Hall. The first essential to popular success is a large theatre, where opera-lovers of modest means can get good seats at a third or quarter the price charged on this occasion. The foundation-stones of such a theatre, seating 4,000 persons, were laid a week after the Denhof-Balling visit! If other musical enterprises afford any criterion at all, the intelligent people of moderate means will support what the wealthy classes cannot (or will not) do; but, as all parties insist on first-rate quality, the only possible method for success lies in a theatre of large capacity and music-hall prices. 'Meistersinger,' 'Elektra,' and 'Tristan' drew the biggest audiences, although the two former, when repeated on the Saturday, quite unaccountably failed to attract.

Madame Kirkby Lunn's lyrical powers were known to be very great, yet their true measure could not be fully realised until one had seen her in Gluck's 'Orféo.' The warmth of her reception at the close of each Act of 'Orféo' afforded abundant evidence of this feeling. Madame Gleeson-White's eminently intellectual qualities were noticeable in her womanly Isolde. Madame Brema (as Brangaene and Klytemnestra) shone again by reason of intense dramatic qualities; by sheer intellectual strength she dominated that wonderful first Act of 'Tristan.' There were several instances of singers in the parts they portrayed taking the stage for the first time, and in one or two cases without any previous experience or stage rehearsal: such were Madame Gleeson-White as Elektra, Mr. Charles Knowles as Kurwenal and the Dutchman, and Mr. Julien Henry as Beckmesser. Most people left the theatre with an enormously-enhanced respect for the art of Miss Edith Evans (Chrysothemis) and Mr. Frederic Austin (Orestes and Hans Sachs).

The scenic requirements were generally effective and often of conspicuous beauty, although the Theatre Royal does not permit of the setting of such scenes as require great depth and distance. Those of 'Orféo' were of quite exceptional nature; but why that attempt at a steam curtain, which is certainly not of the time of Gluck? The chorus was an uncommonly good one, and splendidly disciplined even in the second week of its tour. In the gloom of the Entrance to the Underworld in 'Orféo' they could not possibly see the conductor, yet kept time in excellent fashion. Balling last year proved his worth as a Wagnerian conductor; his task this year could not compare for a moment with that in magnitude, and the next three years will enable us to assess his all-round qualities in more complete manner. Cortolezis, from Munich, who directed 'Elektra,' has had a rare training in Straussian opera; he has conducted 'Elektra' forty times, 'Salome' fifty, 'Feuersnot' a dozen; and 'Rosenkavalier' forty-five. For this tour he has had to reduce Strauss's score to fit the requirements of sixty-five players, instead of the hundred or more usually employed in the chief Continental opera-houses. Apart from his supreme mastery of the score, the most notable feature of his conducting was its rhythmical elasticity—players and singers alike were swayed at his will, and even in the most powerful climaxes the voices were not obscured.

HULL AND LEEDS.

The Hull performances (February 26—March 2), with which the tour began, were not by any means so well attended as they deserved to be. Though in the nature of dress-rehearsals for the other towns, they showed no lack of due preparation, but were admirably complete and effective. By the time the Company came to Leeds (March 18—23) a very high state of finish had been arrived at in every detail. In 'The Mastersingers' the outstanding features in the cast were the Beckmesser of Mr. Charles Victor and the Eva of Miss Florence Easton, which would bear comparison with the best of their predecessors in these parts. As at Hull, the stage of the Theatre Royal was rather too cramped for the second and last scenes, but by clever stage-management the best possible use was made of the limited space. The Church scene was admirably designed, and made a really artistic picture, reminding one strongly of the little church of St. Katharine, in Nuremberg, where the Mastersingers actually held their meetings. The chorus—reinforced at Leeds as well as at Hull by members of the Leeds Choral Union—was exceptionally powerful. The production of Gluck's 'Orpheus' was on similar lines to that which Miss Brema organized at the Savoy Theatre, and was even more picturesquely beautiful and scenically effective. Very seldom has such an imaginative production of opera been witnessed in this country, and the scenery, painted at Berlin, gave evidence of the influence of Prof. Reinhardt in that city, and also tended to show that some German artists have a finer sense of colour than has hitherto been allowed them. The solemnity of the scene by the tomb of Eurydice, surrounded by a grove of stately cypresses, the terror and mystery of Hades, and the bright, spring-like charm of Elysium, were most happily suggested. As for Madame Kirkby Lunn's Orpheus, it is, as may be imagined, a performance of both vocal and histrionic distinction. This and the Wagner performances were admirably conducted by Mr. Balling, while it might be said that the hero of the production of 'Elektra' was Mr. Cortolezis, whose reading threw light on the intricate score, and made many things in it plain which previous performances in this country had left ambiguous. Miss Florence Easton's 'Elektra' was a fine impersonation, and though the feeling of horror which is intended by the composer does not abate, the work grows in interest with further hearings. It is certainly one on which it would be rash to pronounce judgment after a single hearing, though instances are known of this being done! The performance of 'Tristan' had for its distinguishing features the admirable impersonation of Isolde by Madame Gleeson-White, who looked the part to perfection and sang it most artistically, the excellent Tristan of Mr. Maclennan, and the forceful reading of the wok given by Mr. Balling.

LIVERPOOL.

Mr. Ernst Denhof's operatic Festival in Liverpool began in the Shakespeare Theatre on March 11. During the week there were two performances of Strauss's 'Elektra,' two of the 'Meistersinger,' and one each of 'Tristan,' 'The Flying Dutchman,' and 'Orpheus.'

Splendid performances were given. That of 'Elektra' was specially remarkable for the extraordinary power of Miss Florence Easton's performance in the title-rôle, which was memorable in its histrionic as well as vocal brilliance. Apart from the sensational features of this much-debated opera, its two performances failed to make a favourable impression.

HALIFAX MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

This excellent choir placed itself in the front rank of choral organizations of its kind, by winning the chief Challenge Shield for Mixed-voice choirs, at the Blackpool Festival in October, 1911. There is no higher standard of unaccompanied part-singing in this country than that imposed by the exigencies of this particular competition.

MR. T. W. BENSON.
(President since 1908.)

The Halifax choralists have won their blue riband only in the severe and chastening school of failure, accepted manfully and with a determination to profit by the lesson. The Society developed from the Halifax West End Glee Union for male voices, which was formed in 1889. In October, 1895,

MR. H. SHEPLEY.
(Conductor.)

Mr. H. Shepley was invited to conduct the Union, and under his régime the organization won a second prize at Nelson in 1896, and a first at Rochdale in the same year. In December, 1897, it was resolved that a Mixed-voice Choir should be grafted on the Union, and in 1898 the new body began its existence. Both the Male-voice Choir and the Mixed-voice Choir competed at Morecambe in 1898, but with not a very happy result. At Bradford in the same year they came nearer to the top. In September, 1899, the name was changed to the Halifax Madrigal Society, and a series of concerts was undertaken. Works with orchestra were included in the programmes. Competitions were not again entered until 1909, when an attempt was made at Morecambe without much success. At Blackpool, in 1910, the gaining of the third place in the chief class, spurred the Society on to another effort in 1911, when, as already stated, they gained the first place. After this success, the conductor and committee, struck by the originality of some of the part-songs by Granville Bantock that were used as tests at Blackpool, formed the idea of giving a concert at Halifax, the choral programme for which was to be selected entirely from Bantock's compositions in this form. In view of the extreme difficulty of the composer's vocal writing, this was a bold scheme, but it was splendidly carried out on March 9, before an audience numbering nearly 2,500 persons.

The following is a list of the choral pieces performed: 'The Tyger,' 'Annie Laurie,' 'In the silent west,' 'Awake! Awake!' 'Arranmore,' 'Spring enchantment,' 'On Himalay,' 'Emer's lament,' 'The moon has raised,' 'The Leprehaun,' 'Spirit of night,' 'Coronach.'

Only those acquainted with the extraordinary technical difficulties of some of these pieces will be able to appreciate the merit of the almost perfect performances that were given. There are passages in 'The Leprehaun' and 'Spirit of night' that would make most choirs quail. Yet with the exception of a few bars in the former part-song (which, it seems, need not be sung as written if the 'atmosphere' is caught and the key not lost), there was no lack of ease and fluency. The tone of these Yorkshire choralists is superb, and the singers showed power to sing with the most subtle rhythmic delicacy. Miss Lucy Nuttall gave very charming and highly temperamental performances of five songs from the 'Sappho Cycle' (Bantock), and Herr Willy Lehmann played violoncello solos very artistically. Mr. Bantock and Mr. Shepley conducted.

Mr. H. Shepley, the conductor, is the youngest of three brothers, all very capable baritone singers. The elder brother, Mr. Dan Sutton Shepley, is now, and has been for some twenty years, a Gentleman of His Majesty's Chapel Royal. Mr. H. Shepley was a choir-boy in the Halifax Parish Church under Dr. Varley Roberts, now of Oxford, and rose to be principal solo boy. When his voice broke, he commenced singing baritone there, under Mr. Garland (organist at that time). About eighteen years ago he left the Parish Church to take charge of the famous quartet choir in connection with Square Congregational Church, this style of singing being introduced by the late Dr. Mellor, after his return from America. He is still in charge of the music there, but the choir is now a double quartet. A few years ago he was baritone, and conductor, of a very successful and capable male quartet of voices, who travelled professionally, mostly in the North of England, under the name of 'The Abbey Choristers.' Since his youth he was brought up as a designer at Messrs. Crossley's Dean Clough Carpet Works. This employment he left some years ago, to take up the profession of teacher of singing, which he now carries on so successfully. Mr. T. W. Benson, who is the third president the Society has had, took office in 1908. He has taken a very keen, practical interest in the work of the choir.

The Society has entered for the 'Excellence' mixed-voice choir class in the International Choral Competitions to be held at Paris at Whitsuntide.

Dr. Orlando A. Mansfield, organist and choirmaster of Belgrave Church, Torquay, has been appointed to the chair of Professor of Music in Wilson College, Pennsylvania, U.S.A. Wilson College is one of the most reputable colleges for women in the States. It possesses a fully equipped faculty of music with a large concert hall and organ.

Performances of Gounod's 'Redemption,' in addition to those mentioned in our last issue, have taken place at Bordeaux on March 1, and at Binche (Belgium) on March 17.

THE BARROW MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

VISIT TO LONDON.

Metropolitan concert-goers have become familiar with the power of large choirs from the provinces, but they have very little knowledge of the capacity of the small choirs whose speciality is unaccompanied part-music. The perfection achieved in the art of fine part-singing is best experienced at some of the Northern competitive centres. It is not that first-rate singing is not hard further South, but it is certainly rarer than in the districts mentioned above, and, moreover, as the best Southern choirs do not hear a number of other choirs of their own standard as they do constantly in the North, the stimulus to attain perfection is weaker. One of the best of the Northern choirs is the Barrow Madrigal Society, conducted by Mr. T. M. Bourne. Since its formation in 1900 it has won over seventy prizes at competitions. Barrow is a great shipbuilding town on the Lancashire coast. One cannot ascribe the good quality of the voices of its choralists to the softness of its climate. It is easier to assume that the results attained are due to the enthusiasm and innate musical capacity of the singers and the moulding power of Mr. Bourne, who shapes their singing so artistically. The promoters of the Broadwood Concerts have earned the hearty thanks of all who were able to be present at the concert organized at Æolian Hall on March 7. It was a bold and expensive undertaking to bring a choir 300 miles for the benefit of the subscribers to these select concerts, but it was fully worth while. The only cause for regret was that the choir could not be represented at more than half its normal strength. The following was the

CHORAL PROGRAMME.

The above pieces were sung in sets as bracketed, and the only other item on the programme was the performance of Brahms's Waltzes (Op. 39) for the pianoforte, by Miss Auriol Jones. We cannot give a detailed criticism of the performance of the Choir. It must suffice to record that the execution of the whole programme was extraordinarily good. To our thinking the finest achievements of the choir were the interpretation of 'Sweet honey-sucking bees,' 'Craig Dhu' (has any Metropolitan choir attempted this?), the gay and charming, 'O la, O che buon eco,' in which the echo was performed in a fascinating style, 'Cold Winter,' 'On Himalay,' and 'Evening scene.'

The Choir travelled from Barrow on the day of the concert, and many returned the same night.

OPERA IN YIDDISH.

A novelty in the way of operatic enterprise was inaugurated on March 16, when The Temple, a theatre in Commercial Road East, devoted to the performance of opera and drama in Yiddish, was formally opened. Yiddish, it is perhaps as well to explain, is the vernacular of the Jewish people. It is preserved more among the foreign than the English members of the community, and is a curious mixture of the original Hebrew much corrupted, German, Russian, and a few words borrowed from the country in which its users happened to be settled. Remnant though it be, it is still a national language, and the enterprise that is to make use of it in opera consequently resolves itself into a form of national opera.

In the first work mounted—a Biblical opera entitled 'King Ahaz,' written and composed by Mr. S. Alman, organist of the Great Synagogue—nationalism is fully preserved. The story deals with the Jewish kings, their idolatry and final return to the original religion, with a dramatic undercurrent of child-sacrifice running through it; and the music is a good deal in the style of the Synagogue chants, and preserves national characteristics to the full. As a first effort it has marked dramatic import, the vocal- and choral-writing is good, and the orchestration shows a feeling for colour. The performance is a notable proof of the gifts of the Jewish people. The soprano, Miss Zausmer, has the makings of a fine operatic artist; M. Winogradoff is the stage-manager and baritone; Mr. Kasinsky has a good tenor voice and vigorous style; there is an excellent contralto in Miss Davies, and there is no tailing off either in the quality of the other principals or in the chorus. Mounting and scenery are lavish, and the small orchestra competent. The house holds 1,500, and the prices range from five shillings to sixpence. The inauguration of this significant undertaking was carried out by Sir Francis Montefiore.

THE CROWN OF INDIA.

MASQUE AT THE COLISEUM.

The most interesting recent development of music-hall enterprise is undoubtedly the inclusion of a patriotic masque, with music by Sir Edward Elgar, in the programme at the Coliseum. The masque, written by Mr. Henry Hamilton, is entitled 'The Crown of India,' and its theme is the dispute between Delhi (Miss May Leslie Stuart) and Calcutta (Miss Evelyn Kerry) for supremacy. In the first tableau India (Miss Nancy Price) holds a court of her twelve chief cities. Delhi pleads her past glory and summons four Mogul Emperors as witnesses; Calcutta pleads her present greatness, her world-wide commerce, her 'glorious yesterday,' summoning John Company and her 18th century heroes. St. George (Mr. Harry Dearth) arrives, and on the announcement of the coming of the Emperor and his consort, he urges Delhi and Calcutta to be hand-in-hand in loyalty, and yields his position as arbiter. In the second tableau, representing a scene at the Durbar, His Majesty decrees that Delhi shall be the Capital and Calcutta the Premier City of India.

The composer has abandoned none of the distinction of his later style, and the music is wholly individual and often novel. It makes its popular appeal by broad and striking effect more than by obvious tunefulness. More cannot be said, as the conditions obscured the details, which doubtless conveyed the chief interest of the music. The score included two songs, 'Hail, Immemorial Ind!' sung by Agra (Miss Marion Beeley), and 'The rule of England,' sung by St. George. The former we would like to hear as a concert selection. Sir Edward Elgar conducted, and was announced to do so at each performance.

MR. BALFOUR GARDINER'S CONCERTS.

The first of the series of choral and orchestral concerts organized by Mr. Balfour Gardiner was given at the Queen's Hall on March 13. The programme presented was highly-varied, and bore witness to the sincerity of Mr. Gardiner's promise to give native musicians a chance. The first work performed was a setting of the poem 'Enchanted Summer,' from Shelley's 'Prometheus Unbound,' for two solo sopranos, mixed-voice chorus and orchestra, by Arnold Bax.

It served to display the progress the talented composer is making in the technique of his art and in the expression of his fanciful imagination. The orchestration irresistibly suggests the word Debussy occasionally, and the vocal parts do not provide special attraction; they seem to be simply parts added to an orchestral idea. But the colour and fancy of the music always interested and gratified the attention. A 'Dance Rhapsody' for orchestra, by Delius, was a favourable specimen of this very subtle composer's style. Mr. Percy Grainger was well in evidence, first by an effective unaccompanied choral arrangement, without words, of an Irish tune from Londonderry. His setting of a dance folk-song from the Færo Islands attracted much attention. The words are gruesome, and the air has no special beauty; but Mr. Grainger's treatment made the very utmost of its rhythmic features. The arrangement is for five men's solo voices, double-mixed choir, strings, brass, mandolines and guitars. How much the undoubted success of the piece depended upon the novelty of thirty ladies and gentlemen thrumming their mandolines and guitars, and the vehemence of the climax, would be hard to say. Three wholly new settings of words by Kipling: 'The Morning song in the Jungle,' 'Tiger! Tiger!' and 'We have fed our sea for a thousand years,' hardly made so popular an appeal. They displayed originality in harmonic treatment, but not always an obvious appropriateness to the words. Mr. Gardiner's setting of Masefield's 'News from Whydah,' for choir and orchestra, was among the most successful productions of the concert. It has abundant vitality, and the music seems born of the words, and moreover the choral writing is straightforward and not a mere adjunct of the orchestral parts. Mr. W. H. Bell's setting of the Scotch Border ballad 'The Baron of Brackley,' for choir and orchestra, was the last item of a not too lengthy concert. The subject of this ballad is gloomy, and so therefore we must not complain that the music is sombre. Mr. Bell does not seem to have 'found himself' in this work so well as in other of his compositions. True there is much to admire and command respect, but the general effect is not convincing.

The soloists in Mr. Bax's work were Miss Caroline Hatchard and Miss Carrie Tubb. The London Choral Society provided the choir, and they have never before shown more pliability to the various demands made upon their choral technique. The New Symphony Orchestra was also engaged. Mr. Arthur Fagge, Mr. Balfour Gardiner, and Mr. Percy Grainger conducted. There was a good audience, but not so good as such a generous enterprise deserved.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

A new Symphony (No. 7, in D minor) by Sir Charles Stanford, was the most interesting feature of the concert given on February 22. In some respects the character of the Symphony was a surprise because so simple and straightforward a composition was hardly expected in these times, when a new orchestral work is so often a melancholy psychological problem. Whilst listening to Sir Charles Stanford's music one could imagine Mozart benignly approving. The Symphony is in three movements. The first Allegro is a joyous outpouring easy to follow. The second movement—a Minuet and Trio—is in a kind of variation form, and the Finale is also based on variations. As the Symphony is practicable for ordinary resources it will no doubt be often heard. The composer conducted, and was recalled many times. The remainder of the concert consisted of Schumann's Pianoforte concerto, admirably played by Mr. Buhlig, and Miss Wilna sang some capital new songs by Mr. Landon Ronald, who conducted the concert.

At the concert given on March 21, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the conductor for the evening, contributed an 'Invocation' for orchestra. In point of design the new work has something in common with the now famous 'Benedictus,' for it is laid out in the form of a broad melody for the strings with accompaniment by the other instruments. But the free and resourceful if over-long development expands the piece into a homogeneous whole of vivid colouring and interest. Apart from this, the latest effort of one who has done so much to advance British music is characteristic of the high state of development of his acknowledged powers and is no inconsiderable addition to his works. It was admirably played. British music was further represented by Mr. Arthur Hervey's Orchestral variations entitled 'Life-Moods,' originally produced at the Brighton Festival of 1910, and now given for the first time in London and under the composer's direction. On the executive side the programme was strong, both Signor Busoni (pianoforte) and Señor Casals (violoncello) taking part. The pianist played the rarely-heard 'Dies Iræ' paraphrase of Liszt, and the violoncellist, who that day had been presented with the Society's gold medal, played the unaccompanied C minor Suite of Bach. The 'Slavonic Rhapsody' of Dvorák and the 'Corsaire' Overture of Berlioz were also performed.

London Concerts.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, QUEEN'S HALL.

At the concert given on February 26, a large audience was drawn by the prospect of the virtuoso conducting of Herr Mengelberg and the violin playing of Franz von Vecsey. The celebrated conductor did not give a special interpretation of the Schubert 'Unfinished'; it did not thrill as it can be made to. But ample amends were made in 'Ein Heldenleben,' the performance of which was the most manificent and exciting we have heard of this outpouring of Strauss's genius and, it must be added, eccentricity. Mengelberg conducted with imperative masterfulness, and the Orchestra seemed under a spell. Vecsey's performance of Max Bruch's C minor Concerto (Op. 26) proved that the great promise of his youth has been amply fulfilled. A fine performance of Brahms's Academic overture concluded a memorable concert.

Herr Fritz Steinbach conducted the concert given on March 18. Beethoven's overture 'Leonora' (No. 3) was given with splendid effect under this fine conductor, but the speciality of the programme was the E minor Symphony of Brahms. Here Herr Steinbach was peculiarly in his element. It is safe to say that no finer interpretation of this much-criticised work has been heard in London. It was not merely that the playing was highly finished, but that it was charged with meaning. Even the last movement chained attention by the virtuosity of the performance. Steinbach has now unquestionably established a high reputation in this country. A young violinist, Herr Adolf Busch, deservedly gained much approbation by his broad and artistic performance of Brahms's Violin concerto. His career will be watched with interest.

BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY, QUEEN'S HALL.

This admirable organization, following the fashion of provincial choral Societies, favoured London with a visit—the first in its history—on February 29. The choir numbered three hundred, and the services of the London Symphony Orchestra were retained. The work performed was Bach's noble B minor Mass. It goes without saying that the choir is a fine one. The sopranos displayed a scintillating, bright resonance; the altos sang with an attractive tone-colour, but they seemed weak in the balance; the tenors did not exhibit so much blendfulness as the other sections of the choir, and the basses had fine sonority and compact attack. The music had been adequately prepared. The interpretation of the Crucifixion and the great Sanctus were outstanding features. The soloists were Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. J. Campbell MacInnes. Mr. Arthur Payne led, Mr. C. W. Perkiss was at the organ, and Dr. G. R. Sinclair conducted.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The chamber concert given by this institution on February 21 provided an interesting revival of Liszt's 137th Psalm, 'By the waters of Babylon,' set for accompanied female voices. The most prominent of the students who took part in the concert was Miss Dorothy Capon, whose Ballade revealed her as a promising composer and pianist.

A Festival March by Mr. Arthur Alexander, a work of bright attractiveness effectively scored, was the only novelty at the orchestral concert given at Queen's Hall on March 18. The chief feature was the Finale from 'Figaro,' sung by eleven operatic students. Sir A. C. Mackenzie conducted.

A pleasant afternoon of 18th century French and Italian orchestral music was given by Mr. Beecham with his Symphony Orchestra at Æolian Hall on February 24. The composers represented were Méhul, Paisiello, Grétry, Cherubini, Monsigny, Boccherini, and Mozart. Solos were sung by Miss Olga Loewenthal and Mr. Bertram Binyon. Everything was done in a manner appropriate to the school of music adopted for the occasion.

Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion Music was performed with great effect at the Great Central Hall, on February 29, by the Bermondsey Settlement and Hither Green Choral and Orchestral Societies in combination, assisted in the chorales by a choir of girls and boys from Council Schools. Dr. Borland conducted, and Mr. E. Stanley Roper was the organist. Solo parts were taken by Miss Mary Leighton, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Joseph Reed, Mr. Montague Borwell, and Mr. Joseph Farrington.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

On March 2, M. Raoul Pugno added to his former triumphs with Bach's fifth 'Brandenburg' Concerto and Saint-Saëns's fourth Pianoforte concerto. The remainder of the programme consisted of Haydn's seventh 'Salomon' Symphony, Debussy's 'L'après-midi d'un Faune,' and Holbrooke's 'Three blind mice' Variations.

The first of two extra concerts, given on March 16, had a Wagner programme, the greater part of which involved solo-singing. The second, on March 23, provided the privilege of hearing Señor Casals play Dvorák's Violoncello concerto in B minor. Ravel's 'Pavane,' Strauss's 'Don Juan,' Brahms's 'Variations on a theme of Haydn,' Saint-Saëns's Prelude 'Le Déluge' and Scheinpflug's 'Overture to a comedy of Shakespeare' constituted a varied and interesting selection of orchestral works.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.

'The Dream of Gerontius' was performed by the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society, under Mr. Allen Gill's direction, on March 2. The choir sang with their familiar brilliance and feeling, and good solo-singing was provided by Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Stewart Gardner. Perhaps the best feature of the event was the evident enthusiasm for the work displayed by all who were present, whether as performers or as listeners.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The performance of 'The Veil,' given on March 14 by this Society, was a much-needed act of justice, for Sir Frederic Cowen's masterpiece had only once before been heard in London. The singers at the Albert Hall threw themselves with special enthusiasm iinto the task of realising the composer's intentions, and they succeeded admirably. The composer conducted, and secured some moving effects. The solo parts were entrusted to Miss Ada Forrest, Madame Kirkby Lunn, Mr. Morgan Kingston, and Mr. Frederick Ranalow. 'The Veil' was followed by an excerpt from 'Parsifal,' consisting of the Prelude and the Finale to the first Act, with Mr. Stewart Gardiner as Gurnemanz and Mr. Ranalow as Amfortas. Sir Frederick Bridge conducted.

OXFORD HOUSE (LONDON, E.) SOCIETY.

One of the most remarkable experiences of the month was provided on March 20 by the Oxford House Choral and Orchestral Society, in making their annual visit to Queen's Hall. They gave a performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius' that was of striking expressiveness and choral excellence, and showed Mr. Cuthbert Kelly to be an exceptionally able choral trainer. That such a beautiful and sympathetic performance of a difficult modern work can be achieved by an East-End Choir (the settlement is in Bethnal Green, a typical quarter of this vast region) is a satisfactory testimony to the musical potentiality of the Londoner when it is skilfully evolved. The solo parts were taken by Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Herbert Brown.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The fifth Classical Society's concert, given at Bechstein Hall on February 21, partook of the nature of an orchestral concert, for it included a performance of Mozart's Serenade for two oboes, two clarinets, two basset-horns, two bassoons, one double-bassoon and four horns, and the services of a conductor, Mr. Frank Bridge, were required. The revival was deeply interesting, as a study of Mozart's mastery of tone-colour. On February 28, Brahms was represented by two of his most superb chamber works—the Sextet in G major, Op. 36, and the F minor Pianoforte quintet, Op. 34, and by pianoforte works played by Mr. Leonard Borwick.

Mr. Holbrooke gave his second recital of his own and other British composers' music at Æolian Hall on February 22. On this occasion his most notable flight into the unconventional took the form of a performance of his overture to 'The children of Don' on the Æolian organ by mechanical means, with Mr. Easthope Martin as operator. There were songs by Mr. Holbrooke, Mr. Norman O'Neill, Mr. Cyril Scott and Mr. Delius, sung by Miss Waterston; part-songs by Mr. Holbrooke sung by the Gresham Singers, under Mr. Sydney Scott; and pianoforte pieces by Mr. Agate and Mr. Holbrooke, played by Miss Lydia Stace.

'Thursday twelve-o'clock' concerts took place at Æolian Hall on February 22, when 'Solomon,' the child pianist, reigned in all his glory; and on March 14.

The presence of the Brussels Quartet made the Broadwood concert at Æolian Hall, on February 23, a notable event. Their interpretation of Debussy's Quartet was as magical as the music.

Perhaps the most successful of Mr. Thomas Dunhill's recent compositions was the chamber cantata 'Sea fairies,' produced by him at Steinway Hall on February 23. It is written for female voices with pianoforte accompaniment. The vocal parts have the distinction of being vocal, and the whole makes an appeal to popularity through refinement, melodiousness and fancifulness. At his next concert, given on March 1, his Phantasy for pianoforte, violin and viola (one of those commissioned by Mr. Cobbett) was performed and proved highly attractive.

It is seldom possible to enjoy music written for and played upon ancient instruments so much as when Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch is in charge. His enthusiasm for his hobby—or rather his life-study—is infectious. He gave recently—on February 14 and 26—two concerts of this music at Clifford's Inn, and with the help of members of his own family made them highly interesting exhibitions of quaint, appealing music and skilful performance.

Other chamber concerts of interest were those given by the Motto Quartet at Æolian Hall on March 2; by the Strings Club, at Æolian Hall, on March 9; by the Walenn Quartet on March 11; and by the Royal College of Music on March 1 and 14.

An exceptionally interesting programme was brought together for the Patron's Fund concert, at Bechstein Hall, on March 12. The chief works played were a Miniature suite for string quartet by Mr. Greville Cooke, a Tone-picture for string quartet by Mr. Arthur Alexander, and a 'Trefoil' for two pianofortes by Miss Ethel E. Bilsland, highly contrasted works, all of which displayed ingenuity and sound technique. The solo performers of the concert were Miss Ella Caspers and Mr. Alec Tait-Knight (vocalists), Miss Evelyn Dawkin (pianist), Miss Audrey Richardson (violinist), and Miss Edith Penville (flautist).

Students of Trinity College gave a concert on March 18, at which a movement from Svendsen's Octett was the principal work performed.

Music for the viola, written by Messrs. Cyril Scott, Frank Bridge, B. J. Dale and York Bowen, supplied material for a concert given by Mr. Lionel Tertis, at Æolian Hall, on March 18, before the Society of British composers. Two pieces for two violas by Mr. Bridge were new and attractive.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

The brilliance and expressiveness of Mr. Norman Wilks's playing earned plentiful appreciation at Bechstein Hall on February 24. He is decidedly in the front rank of our younger pianists.

Herr Richard Buhlig repeated Korngold's Sonata at Steinway Hall on February 26. On the same day Mr. E. B. Appleyard made his first appearance at Æolian Hall and played with refinement. On February 27, Mr. F. S. Kelly gave his second, and on March 5 his third recital. Lastly, on March 19, he gave a concert at Queen's Hall, with the London Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. G. Henschel, and gave satisfying interpretations of Concertos by Mozart (D major) and Brahms (B flat).

Among the world's many famous pianists still in their 'teens,' Miss Susanne Mórvay, who gave a recital at Æolian Hall on February 28, is one of the most remarkable. The mental grip shown in her performances of the great G minor Organ prelude and fugue of Bach, and in Beethoven's 'Appassionata' Sonata, were extraordinary.

Mr. Egon Petri completed his recital of Liszt's 'Années de pélerinage' at Bechstein Hall on February 29, and added to his technical feats a performance of a Sonata by Busoni. Mr. Frederic Lamond's scholarly and convincing treatment of Beethoven provided keen enjoyment throughout his recital at Bechstein Hall on March 2.

At Novello's Rooms, on March 4, the London Chamber Concert Association met to receive M. Alexandre Siloti, who gave them a magnificent exhibition of his powers, especially in Bach's music. The chromatic Fantasia and Fugue were splendidly played.

Recitals were given by Dr. Deszö Szánto at Bechstein Hall on March 5, Miss Ella Ulrich at Steinway Hall on March 6, Miss Ella Spravka at Bechstein Hall on March 12, and Mr. David Levine, at Æolian Hall, on March 20.

Three of the world's greatest pianists were heard in London almost within a week. At Queen's Hall, on March 12, Herr Emil Sauer displayed the exhilaration and refinement of his style in Brahms's F minor Sonata, and in Schumann and Chopin. Two days later, in the same hall, M. Busoni fascinated his whole audience with his magical command of tone-colour and gradation. His interpretations of Beethoven's 'Hammerklavier' Sonata and Liszt's B minor Sonata were of memorable grandeur and beauty. At Bechstein Hall, on March 19, M. Godowsky gave a recital, and though he tired his listeners with his own twenty-four 'Walzermasken'—lasting about an hour in performance—he again astonished all with his virtuosity.

Music for two pianofortes provided the material for a pleasant entertainment given by the Misses Sutro at Steinway Hall on March 15. Mlle. Aurora Geremi, a young player, showed exceptional faculties at Bechstein Hall on March 18.

VOCAL RECITALS.

Handel's 'Dove sei,' with accompaniment for organ and strings, copied from the manuscript in the Königliche Bibliothek, Berlin, was sung by Madame Helène Martini, at Bechstein Hall, on February 23. Recitals were given by Mr. Maurice Jeffes (Æolian Hall, February 23); Miss Richenda Clayton (Bechstein Hall, February 26); Professor Leon Rains, the fine bass singer from Dresden (Bechstein Hall, February 27); Mr. F. Procter-Brown, who gave settings of 16th and 17th century English lyrics (Æolian Hall, March 5); Miss Beryl Freeman (Bechstein Hall, March 7); Miss Margery Courtney and Mr. Constantine Morris (Bechstein Hall, March 8); Mr. Gordon Granville (Æolian Hall, March 12); and Mr. M. Sterling Mackinlay (Æolian Hall, March 16).

The Classical Society's concert at Bechstein Hall, on March 6, took the form of a vocal recital by Herr Van Rooy, who showed himself as pre-eminent in lyrical as in operatic singing.

At the Ashburton Club, on March 9, a vocal recital was given by Miss Margaret Finlay and Dr. A. F. Gibson, assisted by Miss May Coleman. Miss Finlay sang some Highland folk-songs.

OTHER RECITALS.

Miss May Harrison, who through her playing makes a strong claim to supremacy among English lady violinists, gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on February 22, and interpreted Mozart, Bach, Sinding and other composers to perfection. Her sisters, Beatrice (violoncellist) and Margaret (pianist-composer), also took part.

Mr. Mario Lorenzi gave one of his interesting harp recitals at Bechstein Hall on February 22.

On February 26, Mr. Franz von Vecsey gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on February 28, and drew particular attention to his astonishing powers of virtuosity. He gave a second recital on March 6, and a third on March 21.

Messrs. Philip and Bewley Cathie (violinist and pianist) and George Uttley (baritone) gave an interesting sonata and song recital at Steinway Hall on February 28.

At Bechstein Hall, on February 28, Mr. Paul Kochanski revived the esteem for his powers created by his last visit, some six years ago.

Miss Jean Sterling Mackinlay completed her series of recitals at the Little Theatre on March 1 and 8, without a break in her success.

The programme of the Barns-Phillips concert at Bechstein Hall, on March 9, consisted of a varied selection from Miss Barns's compositions.

At Steinway Hall, on March 12, Miss Francesca Woolf showed creditable skill as a violoncellist.

Herr Adolph Busch, a young violinist, played with skill and fine dignity at the Classical Society's concert on March 14.

Vocal and instrumental pupils of Madame Montem-Smith and Mr. John Francis Barnett gave a concert at the Guildhall School of Music on March 1.

At Queen's Gate Hall, on March 7, Miss Eva Evalda (violin) and Miss Cissy Boehm (zither), both of whom are still in their teens, gave an attractive recital. Miss Boehm in particular displayed a surprising command over the capabilities of her much neglected and misunderstood instrument.

The clever and rapidly progressing young New Zealand violinist, Miss Audrey Richardson, gave a recital at Æolian Hall on March 19. On the same day Miss Monique Poole, also a violinist, was heard at Broadwood's Rooms.

Miss Alida Loman (soprano) and Miss Jetty Ingenius (pianist) made successful first appearances in a joint recital at Steinway Hall on March 19.

Beethoven's fourth Symphony, Tchaikovsky's 'Le lac des cygnes' and Sinigaglia's 'Le Baruffe Chiozzotte' were among the works excellently performed by the Royal Artillery Band at Queen's Hall, on February 23.

Miss Kimpton's series of orchestral concerts for the young was continued on February 24, when Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony was the chief work played, and Mr. Stewart Macpherson was again the lecturer. Miss Kimpton conducted with marked ability and confidence.

Mr. A. M. Hale, a composer of serious leanings, gave a concert of his own compositions with the help of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Sir Henry Wood, at Queen's Hall on February 28. Selections from his opera, 'The Tempest,' showed ambition somewhat in advance of his capacity; some smaller works, including settings of Shakespeare sonnets, gave greater pleasure. Mr. William Douthitt and Miss Marta Cunningham (vocalists) assisted.

The Smallwood-Metcalfe Choir gave a further exhibition of their capacity to sing madrigals and part-songs, at Queen's Hall, on March 6. Arcadelt's 'Ave Maria' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Summer is gone' were prominent ancient and modern examples.

The first performance in North London of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' was given by Mr. Munro Davison's Choral Society at the Northern Polytechnic, on March 7. The choral singing was notable for its excellent tone. Accompaniments were provided by Mr. Herbert Hodge at the organ and Miss Maud Crouch at the pianoforte. The programme included Schumann's 'In lowly guise thy King appeareth.'

The Civil Service Orchestra, under the presidency of Lord Alverstone, gave their first concert on March 11 at the Holborn Restaurant. The hon. conductor, Mr. J. Stansfeld, secured satisfactory performances of movements from Beethoven's first Symphony and 'Emperor' Pianoforte concerto (soloist Mr. A. P. Steward).

At the annual meeting of the Folk-song Society, held at Steinway Hall on March 16, a musical programme was arranged in which Miss Margaret Layton, Mr. Clive Carey and two Gaelic singers, Mr. MacClennan and Dr. MacCrae, took part.

The Nurses' Choral and Social League gave a miscellaneous concert at Caxton Hall on March 20. The part-songs sung under the direction of Dr. W. H. Herbert Hickox included 'Doubt not thy Father's care' (Elgar), and 'The Shepherd's lullaby' (Edwards).

Suburban Concerts.

Twickenham Philharmonic Society reached a high level of excellence in a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' on February 13. Not the least satisfactory feature of the concert was the fact that the Town Hall contained the largest audience yet attracted by the Society, which for some years past has done progressively good work under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Cowen. A well-balanced choir showed thorough familiarity with the score, and tone-colour and expression were imparted to their interpretation. The soloists were Miss Ida Kahn, Mr. Gwynne Davis, and Mr. Jackson Potter.

The Streatham and South London String Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Sydney Robjohns, gave a concert at Streatham Hall on March 12. The programme included works by Saint-Saëns, Gade, Grieg, Max Bruch, and Tchaikovsky, and the soloists were Miss Dorothy Silk and Mr. R. Purcell Jones (violoncello).

Dr. Lemare, with the assistance of his pupils, gave his fifth concert in aid of the Organists' Benevolent Fund at St. Catherine's Hall, Leytonstone, on February 29. There was a very large audience, and the concert was considered to be a great success.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BELFAST.

The concert of the Philharmonic Society, on February 9, was of a miscellaneous nature, with the two Misses Harrison (violin and violoncello) and Signor Lenghi as soloists. Both of these talented ladies were greatly appreciated. The Society's choir sang 'Go, song of mine' (Elgar); 'The Tyger' (Granville Bantock); 'The Galway piper' (Fletcher); and concluded the concert with Handel's 'Immortal Lord,' from 'Deborah.' The difficult unaccompanied choruses were most interesting, and their creditable performance proved again Dr. F. Koeller's skill in all branches of training. Unfortunately for us, he has announced his intention of going to the Antipodes, and resigning the post he has filled for nearly a quarter of a century with so much distinction to himself and credit to his forces. The next concert of the Society will be his last.

On February 10, Dr. Laurence Walker's chamber concert brought the Brodsky Quartet, with Miss Florence Nixon as vocalist. The programme included Tchaikovsky's Quartet in D, Op. 11, and Beethoven's Op. 18, No. 6. On February 17, Mr. Phillips brought Madame Kirkby Lunn and Mr. Percy Grainger, and, as might be expected from such eminent artists, the concert was very successful. The Bach-Busoni Prelude and Fugue in D minor was perhaps the most notable feature.

Another chamber concert of Dr. L. Walker's was given on March 12, at which he took the leading pianoforte part, in conjunction with Mr. Alex. Cohen (violin) and Mr. A. Hemingway (violoncello).

BIRMINGHAM.

Madame Albani's farewell concert, given in the Town Hall on February 22, was a great success, a large and enthusiastic audience being present to do homage to a great singer.

The Birmingham Philharmonic Society's last orchestral concerts of the current series of eight were given in the Town Hall, on February 28 and March 13 respectively, the conductor being Mr. Thomas Beecham. Two Symphonies (Schubert's 'Unfinished' and Haydn's in C), as well as two Concertos (Bach's in F, known as the 'Brandenburg,' with trumpet, flute, oboe and violin soli, and Liszt's well-known Concerto in E flat, for pianoforte and orchestra, the soloist being Miss Irene Scharrer) were included in the programme of February 28. The interpretation of these items was most gratifying, being both admirable in technique and artistic in conception and execution. Two novelties were introduced at the last concert on March 13, Rutland Boughton's closing scene from his music-drama, 'Uther and Igraine,' and Richard Strauss's 'Love duet' and closing scene from 'Feuersnot,' the Symphony of the evening being Tchaikovsky's No. 5, in E minor. Mr. Rutland Boughton conducted his own work, which impressed one as being somewhat gloomy and mournful, but as far as one was able to judge from a first hearing the music evidently portrays certain emotions of the personages of the music-drama, which deals with the meeting of Uther and Igraine and the birth of the future hero, Arthur.

The Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association, conducted by Mr. Joseph H. Adams, gave a concert recital of Gounod's opera, 'Faust,' in the Town Hall, on March 2, which attracted a crowded audience. The performance, however, was not up to the usual standard to which this Association has accustomed one, evidently owing to insufficient rehearsals. The principal parts were assigned to Madame Florence Parkes Darby, Miss Emily Cleobury, Mr. Walter J. Ottey, Mr. Arthur Cranmer, and Mr. William Bennett.

The last Harrison Concert of the current series took place at the Town Hall on March 4, the executive being the London Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The chief success was attained by the magnificent and thrilling performance of Tchaikovsky's symphonic Tone-poem 'Francesca da Rimini' and Schubert's Symphony, the 'Unfinished.' The whole of the second part of the programme was devoted to Wagner.

A song recital was given in the New Temperance Hall, on March 1, by Miss Marion Cori (mezzo-soprano) and Miss Minnie Melville (soprano), both new-comers to Birmingham.

The last Max Mossel Drawing Room Concert of the present season was given in the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, on March 8, the chief attraction being the re-appearance of the celebrated pianist, Herr Emil Sauer, after an absence of nearly seventeen years. His remarkable interpretation of Beethoven's 'Sonata Appassionata' was a revelation, as was his performance of three Chopin pieces. Mr. Max Mossel contributed some violin solos, the vocalist being Miss Teresa Amalfi (contralto), the accompanist Mr. G. H. Manton.

A performance of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion was given at the Birmingham Cathedral, Part 1 on March 8 and Part 2 on the following afternoon, the Cathedral being crowded on both occasions. Mr. Stephenson conducted, and Mr. T. Appleby Matthews presided at the organ, and Dr. Reynolds gave the recitativo-continuo on a clavichord. An augmented choir and orchestra had been secured for the occasion, and the soli were entrusted to Madame Alice Phillips, Miss Sara Silvers, and the lay-clerks, Messrs. Blackburn, Wilkes, Bennett and Stoddard. The performances were deeply impressive and appealing, and artistically more gratifying than last year.

The Birmingham Symphony Orchestra's last orchestral concert of the season was given in the Town Hall on March 9, under the able conductorship of Mr. Julian Clifford, of the Harrogate Kursaal, who has rendered excellent services during the season, the Orchestra now being in complete sympathy with his beat. He gave a fine performance of Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony, realising some excellent effects. Mr. Watkin Mills was the vocalist, singing with his customary bracing style, and the solo pianist Mr. Wilfred Ridgway, who gave a virile and temperamental performance of Liszt's 'Rhapsodie Espagnole.' Mr. Charles Collier played two dances by Debussy in a brilliant manner.

Mr. R. J. Buckley, the musical critic of the Birmingham Gazette and Express, gave an interesting lecture on 'Some old songs and their stories,' before the members of the Dudley Musical Club on March 9, giving the history of 'God save the King,' 'Comin' through the rye,' 'Annie Laurie,' 'Alice, where art thou,' 'Oh, the lovely Mistress Mace,' 'Death of Nelson,' 'Auld lang syne,' 'Home, sweet home,' 'The anchor's weighed,' and 'Tom Bowling.' The lecture was listened to with great interest, and embodied far-reaching researches quite unknown to the general public.

The Catterall String Quartette gave their last chamber concert of four at Queen's College on March 12, their contributions being Beethoven's String quartet in C major, Op. 59, No. 3, and Brahms's String quartet in C minor, Op. 51, No. 1, to which they did complete justice. Miss Ada Forrest was the vocalist, and sang with temperament and artistic expression. The solo pianist was Miss Mabel Moss, a well-schooled performer. Mrs. J. C. Hock accompanied.

BOURNEMOUTH.

The Symphony Concerts continue to pursue the even tenor of their way, Mr. Dan Godfrey showing no signs of faltering in his determination to present nothing but what is worthy of performance, and that in as creditable a manner as possible. If there have been fewer novelties of value than usual during the past month, two, at least, stood out pre-eminently. These were Sir C. V. Stanford's beautiful Symphony No. 7, in D minor, and Dr. Walford Davies's charming 'Parthenia' Suite, the composer in each case conducting. At the concert on February 22, Sir A. C. Mackenzie conducted some of his compositions, the 'Tam o' Shanter' Humoresque proving effective.

Outside the scope of the symphony concerts several interesting fixtures remain to be recorded. Mr. Godfrey's Benefit Concerts were the occasion of an influx of talented artists, those assisting the bénéficiaire including Madame Gleeson-White, Dr. Georg Henschel, Mr. Arnold Trowell, Mr. Vernon Warner and Mr. James Fernandez. Madame Ada Crossley has appeared, as have also Miss Edith Evans and Mr. Walter Williams (orchestral concert), Franz von Vecsey, Stella Carol, Miss Ellen Bowick, and Madame Clara Butt and Mr. Kennerley Rumford.

A red-letter day was March 9, when Sir Edward Elgar visited the town in order to conduct a concert devoted to his compositions. The second Symphony was the magnum opus of the afternoon, this remarkably impressive but somewhat stern and uncompromising work receiving an excellent interpretation at the hands of the Municipal Orchestra, specially augmented for the occasion.

On February 27 a decidedly pleasing performance of Coleridge-Taylor's expressively picturesque 'Hiawatha' music (Parts 1 and 2) was given by the Municipal Choir and Orchestra. The composer conducted, and obtained very satisfactory results from the combined forces. Miss Leah Felissa, Signor Lenghi and Mr. Julien Henry were the soloists; the latter artist sang with much feeling, and Miss Felissa was dramatically convincing, but Signor Lenghi's efforts were marred by his distressing vibrato. At this concert, too, Dr. H. Holloway, Bournemouth's premier composer and chorus-master of the Municipal Choir, was represented by his choral ballad, 'The Challenge.'

BRISTOL.

At the farewell concert of Madame Albani in the Colston Hall, on February 20, there was a gratifying feature in the appearance upon the platform of 400 members of the Bristol Choral Society, who, under the direction of Mr. Riseley, supported her in Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer.'

The annual concert of St. Luke's Choral Society was held at the Young Men's Christian Association Hall, Bushy Park, on February 26. In addition to the choir and band Mr. W. Palmear was at the pianoforte and Mr. Russell at the organ. Mr. C. H. Bishop directed the performance, the first part of which was devoted to Van Bree's cantata, 'Saint Cecilia's Day.' Miss Pauline Allen sang the solos effectively. In the miscellaneous second part of the concert some members of the Society acquitted themselves creditably as soloists.

On March 6 there was a concert at Colston Hall in aid of the funds of the Sunday Evening Services which are held in the building. An excellent programme was well interpreted by Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Gertrude Winchester, Mr. Hubert Uzielli, and the Bristol Ladies' Quartet (Misses Eugenie Harrison, Isabel Radford, Lily Grant and Ena Peilliel), with Mr. George Riseley at the organ. The accompanist was Mr. W. E. Fowler.

The Bristol Temperance Choral Society gave the thirty-first annual concert on March 6 at the Young Men's Association Hall, St. James's Square. Arthur E. Fisher's cantata, 'The wreck of the Hesperus,' was nicely sung, after which there was a miscellaneous selection. The principal vocalists were Miss Ethel Beetlestone, and Mr. John S. Perry and Mr. Belgrove (both from Exeter Cathedral). Mr. F. Stone was the conductor.

On March 14 the Clifton Quintet held their fourth concert of the season and gratified a large audience at the Victoria Rooms by the admirable manner in which they interpreted an interesting programme. There was a novelty in Loeffler's two Rhapsodies, 'L'Etang' and 'La Cornemuse,' for pianoforte, viola and oboe, the striking effects of which were cleverly presented.

The Bristol Choral Society on March 16 gave a performance of 'Israel in Egypt' at Colston Hall, under the able direction of Mr. George Riseley. Choir and orchestra numbered 500, the leader being Mr. Harold Bernard, and Mr. G. Herbert Riseley at the organ. The soloists were Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Ethel Harris, Miss Gertrude Winchester, Mr. Joseph Reed and Mr. Dan Price. A large audience testified to their delight at the satisfactory manner in which the oratorio was given.

At Victoria Rooms, on March 20, the Bristol Symphony Orchestra gave a concert under the direction of Mr. Maurice Alexander. The programme included César Franck's Symphony in D minor, and Mr. Cyril Rootham's orchestral rhapsody 'A Passer-by.' The vocalist was Miss Amy Perry.

CAMBRIDGE.

Chamber music has been to the fore in Cambridge. The University Musical Society has given four concerts, the visiting performers being the Brussels, Grimson, and Schwiller Quartets. At the final concert Mr. H. Inwards led a performance of Schubert's Octet, and Mozart's Clarinet quintet. In addition to these there was a concert of modern chamber music with quartets by Vaughan Williams and Tanéïew, and the Henkel Quartet also paid us a visit.

Two of Dr. Mann's symphony concerts, conducted by Sir Edward Elgar and Sir Henry Wood, have taken place.

In choral music the University Society gave a very good performance of Bach's 'St. John' Passion music, a work which seems to be coming into favour. The music made a great impression, and certainly deserves more recognition than it has hitherto received.

Local Societies have been active. The Meldreth Society gave 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' and the Royston Society Alan Gray's 'Rock Buoy bell' and Lloyd's 'Hero and Leander.'

The Cambridge Choral Society announces a Festival of two days. 'The Creation,' 'Elijah,' and Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen' are the works selected.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

Through an oversight, mention was omitted last month of the second of Dr. Weekes's symphony concerts at Plymouth, on February 14. The Symphony of the occasion was Dvorák's in G (No. 4).

The Misses Smith secured the appearance of Miss Marie Hall at the last of their musical matinées, on March 6, the violinist being associated with Miss Florence Smith in the 'Kreutzer' Sonata (Beethoven). The 'Jupiter' Symphony (Mozart) was played in a thoroughly artistic manner by Mr. R. G. Evans's Symphony Orchestra, on March 13, and the elastic capabilities of the players was shown by their equally successful treatment of the 'Caprice Italien' of Tchaikovsky, and the 'Valse Triste' of Sibelius.

The King Street Wesleyan Sunday School Choir, holders of the Sunday School Challenge Banner and Shield, sang some of the most attractive pieces in their répertoire on February 26, conducted by Mr. Harry Woodward. On March 6, a choir and band of eighty performers gave selections from 'St. Paul' at Ker Street, Devonport. Mr. F. W. Chorley, conductor, obtained some excellent singing from the choir.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

The first concert of the Torquay Musical Association, under the new conductorship of Messrs. H. E. Crocker and Walter L. Twining (vice Mr. T. H. Webb, resigned), which took place on March 20, was successful. Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony and Beethoven's 'Prometheus' Overture were the chief numbers for the orchestra, and the choir sang Stanford's 'Last Post' and Mendelssohn's 'As the hart pants.'

CORNWALL.

It is painful to record the suspension of the Penzance Choral Society (of which Mr. Alan Thorne is the present conductor) through lack of support. At the annual meeting on February 28, it was announced that the proposed autumn concert had to be abandoned owing to the small attendances at rehearsal, chiefly of the male section. The Society has been at work for fifty-three years. There was no alternative but to suspend operations for at least twelve months.

On February 28, Mr. T. Lean conducted the Saltash Wesleyan Choir through a programme illustrating points in a lecture given in collaboration with Sir Frederick Bridge, on the Wesleyan Tune Book.

EDINBURGH.

In the Queen's Hall, on February 20, Mr. John Tait's Select Choir gave an interesting concert. The programme comprised works by Elgar, Bantock and other composers. The Northern Choral Society, conductor Mr. J. A. Crichton, gave its ninth annual concert in the Music Hall on February 24. Goring Thomas's 'Sun-Worshippers,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-Bon Suite' were the works performed. The choir sang in a most praiseworthy manner, which reflected much credit on the conductor.

St. Cuthbert's Musical Association, conducted by Mr. G. W. Crawford, gave a well-attended concert in the Music Hall on February 27. The programme was drawn up on popular lines, and comprised orchestral selections, choruses, part-songs, all of which were given in excellent style.

The sixteenth annual concert of Mr. Moonie's Choir was given in the Music Hall on February 28. The works selected for performance were Verdi's 'Stabat Mater,' Brahms's 'Ave Maria,' MacCunn's 'Lay of the Last Minstrel'—all performed for the first time in Edinburgh—and Félicien David's Symphonic ode, 'The Desert.' The soloists were Misses Eva Rich and Alice Cleugh, and Messrs. James Taylor, Walter Lawley, W. H. Oldham, Bridge Peters and George Campbell. In 'The Desert,' Mr. R. C. H. Morrison, as reciter, gave an impressive reading of the 'melodrama.' An excellent orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. James Winram, provided the accompaniments, and also gave a splendid interpretation of a new Concert-overture, '1745,' composed by Mr. W. B. Moonie, a son of the conductor. The latest work by this talented young cpmposer shows a notable command of orchestration, and was most favourably received. Throughout the evening the choir sang with the unity of expression, brilliancy of execution, and beauty of tone and phrasing which are ever-present features in its performances. Lovers of choral music in Edinburgh owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Moonie for the large number—some twenty-five—of important works of which he has given first performances in Edinburgh.

The annual concert of the University Musical Society was held in the music class-room on March 1. Under Mr. J. A. Moonie's able direction the choir gave admirable performances of 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet,' and excerpts from 'Faust.'

The Royal Choral Union, conductor Mr. T. H. Collinson, gave its annual concert in the Music Hall on March 11. The works performed were Parts 1 and 2 of 'The Creation,' and Smart's 'The Bride of Dunkerron.' The large and well-trained body of singers gave the various choruses with fine solidity of tone, precision of attack, and tunefulness. In 'The Bride of Dunkerron,' the choir specially distinguished itself in 'Down through the deep' and 'Hail to Thee.' The soloists, who were all thoroughly capable, were Miss Melita, Mr. Morgan Kingston, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. A full orchestra, led by Mr. W. H. Cole, lent efficient aid.

At a meeting of the Bach Society, held in the Cathedral Hall on March 12, Dr. Walford Davies gave a highly appreciated lecture on 'The art of Bach and modern music.'

GLASGOW.

For his second chamber concert on February 20, Mr. A. M. Henderson had associated with him the Brussels Quartet. A judiciously contrasted programme was presented—Haydn's Quartet in G major, Dvorák's Quartet in F major, and Brahms's Pianoforte quintet in F minor. In all of these the ensemble was perfect, the Quintet, in which Mr. Henderson played the pianoforte part, being especially well received by the audience.

The annual concert of the University Choral Society took place on February 27. The programme included more or less familiar choral numbers by Bach, Di Lassus, Tchaikovsky, Brahms, Elgar, &c., the choir's best work being exhibited in the unaccompanied pieces. Vocal solos were given by Miss Isabel Wilkie and Mr. Marcus Thomson, and Mr. A. M. Henderson, in addition to his duties as conductor, contributed pianoforte solos. Mr. W. F. Forsyth accompanied.

It so happened that the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company and the Moody-Manners Opera Company held the boards of the Theatre Royal and the Grand Theatre respectively for the same fortnight, March 4 to 16, with the result that both companies played to comparatively small audiences. The Moody-Manners Company gave for the first time in Glasgow the stage presentation of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah,' and one would have expected crowded audiences to hear the familiar work in new surroundings; but, curiously enough, the three presentations given were possibly the poorest from the box-office point of view. The work lends itself well to stage setting and performance, and this fact minimises in a measure the loss of massive effect generally secured in concert performances by large choral bodies.

The Orpheus Choir's concert on March 14 drew an audience which completely filled St. Andrew's Hall. The programme contained no fewer than eighteen unaccompanied pieces, all of which were sung entirely from memory—a somewhat unique feat in itself—with a delicacy, finish, and beauty of tone worthy of the highest praise. Especially fine was the choir's performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Summer is gone,' Elgar's 'Evening scene,' and Walter Hately's 'Diaphenia.' Five part-songs, the composition of the conductor (Mr. Hugh S. Roberton), were included in the programme, and of these one of the most effective was 'All in the April evening.' Mention must also be made of Mr. Roberton's excellent annotation of the programme. Solos were sung by Miss Caroline Hatchard and Mr. Plunket Greene, and Mr. Wilfrid Senior accompanied.

Quite a large number of other music-makings have taken place, among them being pianoforte recitals by Sauer and Lamond, a vocal recital by Mr. Robert Burnett, a Harrison concert with the London Symphony Orchestra (conducted by Nikisch), choral concerts by the Gaelic Musical Association (Mr. W. Armstrong) and the Young Men's Christian Association Choir (Mr. R. L. Reid), a concert performance of selections from 'Carmen' and 'Faust' by the Grand Opera Society (Mr. R. Hutton Malcolm), the annual concert by the students of the Athenæum School of Music, Messager's 'Veronique' by the Amateur Operatic Society (Mr. Wilfrid Senior), Sullivan's 'Ruddigore,' by the Orpheus Club (Mr. James Barr), and a concert by the Ladies' String Orchestra, given on February 29, under Miss Hilda Bailey.

GLOUCESTER AND DISTRICT.

The last concert of the Gloucester Choral Society's season was given at the Shire Hall on March 19, when Verdi's 'Requiem' and Handel's Suite for strings, were performed. There was a large audience and the concert was a most gratifying success. The heavy demands which the 'Requiem' made upon the choir received a noble response. The soloists were Madame Alice Phillips, Miss Sara Silvers, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs, and Mr. Harry Downing. Dr. Brewer conducted.

On February 27, the Cheltenham Philharmonic Society gave 'The Flying Dutchman' (Wagner) at the Town Hall. A large orchestra was engaged, and Mr. C. J. Phillips led his forces to a successful achievement. Among the soloists, chief honours were borne by Mr. Charles Tree, as the Dutchman; Miss Laura Evan-Williams took the part of Senta, Mr. George Baker represented Daland, and Mr. Joseph Reed sang the solos of Erik. The quality of the choir and solo work made the concert most enjoyable.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

At the tenth Philharmonic concert on February 20, Glazounow's sixth Symphony in C minor created a favourable impression by the nobility of its style and fine workmanship. Joseph Holbrooke's 'Viking' does not present its gifted composer in an attractive light, and as a fantastic attempt at programme-music it was less approved than Liadoff's 'Baba-Jaga,' which is based on a Russian fairy-tale. Strauss's 'Also sprach Zarathustra' received a fine performance, which was conducted with great skill by Sir Frederic Cowen, and a strangely assorted programme closed with Dukas's Scherzo, 'L'Apprenti Sorcier.' In his songs M. Anzo Bozani did not create a furore, and it was left to the choir to provide special pleasure by their beautiful singing of Brahms's folk-songs 'In silent night' and 'Love, fare thee well,' in which they received the rare compliment of an encore.

Sir Henry Wood conducted the eleventh concert on March 5, the programme being entirely devoted to Wagner; the orchestra being augmented to ninety players, a splendid array which did full justice to its own powers and to the conductor's attention to detail.

At the seventh concert of the Akeroyd Symphony Orchestra on February 13, a 'plébiscite' programme included Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony (which seems to have replaced the 'Pathetic' in public favour), Schubert's 'Rosamunde' Overture, Schumann's 'Träumerei,' and Liszt's second 'Hungarian Rhapsody.' They were admirably played under Mr. Akeroyd's expert direction, and Mr. Frederic Brandon gave a brilliant performance of the solo pianoforte part in Liszt's Concerto No. 2, in A major. The vocalist was Miss Emily Breare.

The eighth and closing concert of the Akeroyd series on February 27 was distinguished by the presence of Sir Charles V. Stanford, who conducted his new Philharmonic Symphony No. 7, in D minor. It is an interesting, clever, and melodious work which enhances the composer's reputation, and does timely service to native musical art as a successful modern example of pure absolute music. Mr. Plunket Greene greatly added to the enjoyment of the audience by his delightful singing of several of Stanford's arrangements of Irish airs.

As president of the Rodewald Concert Club, Sir Charles Stanford attended the concert held on February 26, when his Quartet for strings in B flat (Op. 104) was played by Miss Edith Robinson, Miss Isabel McCullagh, Miss Lillie Sims and Miss Mary McCullagh.

'Elijah' was sung in the Philharmonic Hall by the Liverpool Choral Society on March 9, the vocal principals being Miss Olive Clare, Miss Hilda Cragg-James, Mr. Joseph Cheetham, and Mr. Robert Burnett. The leader of the orchestra was Mr. John Lawson, with Mr. Coller at the organ. Conducted by Mr. Percival Ingram, the performance possessed many commendable features, the singing of the large choir (which is mainly recruited from the Nonconformist choirs of the city) being marked by intelligence and expression, although not specially remarkable for dramatic accentuation.

The community is again indebted to Mr. Harry Evans and the Welsh Choral Union for their latest performance, on March 16, of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion. As in 1907, they gave a noble reading of this immortal work. The new version edited by Sir Edward Elgar and Mr. Ivor Atkins was used, which retains the words of the authorized version in the recitatives, and endeavours to reproduce Bach's declamation as closely as the English words allow. The recitatives allotted to the tenor voice were sung with singular felicity of style and expression by Mr. Gervase Elwes. Commendable dignity marked the singing by Mr. Ivor Foster in the Christ-music. The other vocal principals were Miss Gladys Honey, Miss Dilys Jones, and Mr. Hamilton Harris, whose singing was inspired by the correct spirit. The dramatic element in the choral music is designedly secondary, but in the opportunities which occur, as 'Have lightnings, and thunders,' and in the Barabbas cry, the qualities of the Welsh choir in fire and force shone out vividly. They were also shown by beauty of piano tone in the chorales, and by alert singing in the double choruses.

At their third chamber concert on February 24, the Brodsky Quartet played Schumann's Quartet in A, Op. 41, No. 3, Mozart's Quintet in G minor (second viola Mr. Barker), and Brahms's Sonata for pianoforte and 'cello, in which Mr. Edward Isaacs and Mr. Carl Fuchs collaborated.

Three pianoforte recitals of more than passing importance are deserving of notice. The first was given by Mr. Herbert Fryer on March 1, the second by Mr. Frederic Brandon on March 2. In their recitals the executive equipment and temperamental qualifications of these clever young native pianists were successfully displayed. But it was reserved for a young lady, Miss Susanne von Morvay, to create the greatest sensation at her pianoforte recital on March 4. At the age of sixteen it is no exaggeration to say that this young Hungarian is already fit to be placed in the front rank of pianoforte virtuosi.

The successful series of Harrison Concerts were brought to a brilliant conclusion in the Philharmonic on March 14, when Mr. Nikisch conducted the London Symphony Orchestra in Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, Tchaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini,' and in a Wagner selection in which the 'Trauermarsch' made a deep impression. Mr. Percy Harrison has never exhibited his wisdom and experience as an impresario more usefully than in this concert.

The third concert of the Warrington Musical Society was held in the Parr Hall on March 20, when a performance was given of Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater,' and of Dr. C. T. Reynolds's effective chorus, 'For all the Saints,' originally written for the recent Festival of the Liverpool Church Choir Association, and orchestrated by Dr. Reynolds for this performance. Conducted by Mr. F. H. Crossley, the excellent choir and orchestra of 200 performers were also heard to advantage in the Dvorák music, in which the vocal principals were Madame Sadler-Fogg, Miss Dora Arnell, Mr. Joseph Cheetham and Mr. James Coleman.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

The past month has been one of unexampled congestion, and labour troubles must have left their mark in diminished attendances and impoverished exchequers. Although Mr. Michael Balling does not officially begin to reign o'er us until next October, yet his week of opera-conducting under Mr. Ernst Denhof's management (dealt with elsewhere in these pages), followed by his direction of the last Hallé concert, and of the Pension Fund concert on March 21, have constituted his real entrance into our musical life, still further emphasized by the dinner in his honour on Monday, March 11, by the Manchester Deutscher-Verein. The guest of the evening contrasted the essentially practical, common-sense English nature with the more idealistic German philosophy of life; a union of these two natures could, in his opinion, accomplish anything in the artistic life. Enthusiastic applause greeted his remark that it was his ambition to establish opera in Manchester, adding, with a grim smile, 'It will be found expensive.'

Sir Henry Wood has resigned his position as conductor of the four orchestral concerts of the Gentlemen's series, and this body has appointed Balling in his stead. The visiting conductors to the Hallé series have been Percy Pitt, Holländer, and Thomas Beecham, only the latter displaying any conspicuous masterly control, his finest work being the accompaniment to Brodsky's reading of Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto, Delius's 'Dance Rhapsody,' and Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel.'

The past season has witnessed the laying of the Delius bogey; this fearsome ultra-modernist has been represented by the 'Brigg Fair' and 'Appalachia' Variations, in addition to the 'Rhapsody,' and the Manchester public has vigorously applauded, evidently finding him much to its taste. By a strange irony, Beecham's visit coincided with the performance of 'Elektra' at the Theatre Royal, and the Hallé audience was largely depleted in consequence, but he must be ranked with the three or four conductors who have impressed us with their grip of matters. On March 14, Balling conducted the third acts of 'Lohengrin' and 'Tannhäuser'; it will not have been in vain if the Hallé executive realises the artistic futility of using such an unwieldy choir on such occasions; experiences at the opera the previous week spoiled everybody for Wagner's choruses given by over two hundred singers.

After all our varied experience of the art of conducting during the winter, there came Arthur Nikisch on March 13, to the final Harrison concert, and at the end of his programme one felt that it could be said without injustice and with propriety and veracity 'the others also ran.'

Evidently the recent performance of Bantock's 'Atalanta in Calydon' has fired the ambitions of several of our most prominent choral conductors, for already it is announced that on October 30 next in Manchester, and probably in the following week in Liverpool, the combined forces of the Birkenhead 'Gitana' Ladies' Choir, the Liverpool Welsh Choral Union and the Manchester Orpheus Male-voice Society are to co-operate in its production, Mr. Walter Nesbitt conducting in Manchester and Mr. Harry Evans in Liverpool. Mr. Herbert Whittaker also will conduct the work in Hanley at the third concert of the North Staffordshire and District Choral Society in the spring of 1913. At the Manchester Cathedral, Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson gave Bach's motet 'Jesu, priceless Treasure,' on the first Sunday in Lent with the usual choir after evensong; performed alla cappella, its nine or ten separate numbers were given without the slightest fall in pitch—no mean accomplishment in a work occupying twenty-five minutes.

Concerts of chamber music have not been numerous, but of exceptional excellence. The second Schiller concert brought us the Brussels Quartet, with whom Mr. Isidor Cohn co-operated in the Brahms F minor Quintet, where we got all the old brilliance allied to breadth of style. Not much music by Dohnànyi has been played here—Richter years ago introduced a symphony of his which had great freshness (and heavenly length !), and his D flat Quartet had much in common with the larger work in this respect.

Egon Petri we have known as a great Bach and Beethoven player; and now we find him a great Lisztianer. The room has been too small to hold his overflowing audiences for the 'Années de Pélerinage' recitals.

Rutland Boughton's visit to the Musical Society brought us new concert-room experiences—lowered lights and screened performers, the latter condition contributing partly to indistinct verbal utterance—no one knew for certain when the music had reached its end, and so there was no applause. Under some conditions this is very desirable. Fiona Macleod, William Morris, Edward Carpenter—such are some of the sources of Boughton's inspiration. William Morris's 'The Chapel in Lyonesse' and Fiona Macleod's 'Daughter of the Sun' had a string quartet accompaniment. Mr. Francis Harford, Mr. Norman Allen, Mr. Frank Slater, and Miss Newton-Hague were the vocalists.

The Accrington Choral Society, conducted by Mr. W. S. Walker, has now completed seventy years of musical activity in a thriving manufacturing and engineering centre. The celebration concert on March 6 had an unusual scope, the programme embracing Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and 'Alto rhapsody,' and Elgar's 'Black Knight' cantata, Miss Phyllis Lett taking the solo part in the Brahms 'Rhapsody' and singing four of Bantock's 'Sappho' songs.

The Bolton Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. Charles Risegari, on March 15 performed Goring Thomas's posthumous cantata, 'The Swan and the Skylark,' with Stanford's orchestration. A local pianist, Miss Constantine, played the solo part in Mendelssohn's 'Capriccio brillant,' the orchestra being composed mainly of gifted local amateurs. Fine singing was exhibited by Mr. George Parker in one of Brahms's 'Serious songs' and Miss Myra Dixon in two of the Elgar 'Sea-Pictures,' with orchestral accompaniment. In the cantata these singers were joined by Miss Doris Carter and Mr. Anderson Nicol.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE AND DISTRICT.

Two orchestral concerts within the confines of a single week proved an unusual event. On Friday, March 8, Mr. Percy Harrison brought the London Symphony Orchestra under Nikisch, and was rewarded with a packed house. The extraordinarily fine playing of the orchestra and Nikisch's powerful personality made the concert one of supreme interest. The programme included Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, Tchaikovsky's lurid 'Francesca da Rimini' Symphonic-poem, a Weber overture, and a group of Wagner numbers. Tchaikovsky was also represented at the concluding concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra on the following Thursday afternoon, when the fifth Symphony was given. Mr. E. L. Bainton must be congratulated on his own increasing skill as a conductor.

The Newcastle Musical Society concluded its season on March 6, when Brahms and Beethoven were played by a local string quartet (Messrs A. Wall, J. Young, A. Hervé and Miss Hetty Page). Mr. G. H. Gage contributed some brilliantly-played pianoforte solos, and Miss Cecilia Kemp some songs. The Whitley Bay and District Choral Society sang on February 28 Palestrina's 'Stabat Mater,' Bach's motet, 'Come, Jesu, come,' a group of five Elizabethan Madrigals and Ayres, Bantock's eight-part

No. 45.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICAL COMPETITION & DEMONSTRATION FOR CHOIRS, ORCHESTRAS, & BANDS.

PARIS, MAY 26, 27 (WHIT-MONDAY), AND 28.

I.—THE CHORAL COMPETITIONS.

The entries closed on February 10. We give, on p. 2, a list of all the entries in classes in which British choirs will compete. 'Excellence' is the highest Division, the next is 'Superior,' and below that the classes are Division I., II., &c.

Each choir has to sing the stated test-piece and music of its own choice.

Forty-five British choirs, and about 130 choirs of other nationalities have entered. They include about 11,000 choralists.

It is estimated that board and lodging and rail fare, either from the Friday to Monday or from Saturday to Tuesday, will cost about £2, the amount varying according to the route (Folkestone-Boulogne or Newhaven-Dieppe) and the class of hotel. The Paris Committee is arranging these terms with the transport companies and the hotel-keepers.

II.—NON-COMPETITIVE SINGING.

Tuesday, May 28.—This section is open to any choir which may be formed for the occasion. There are no money-prizes, but trophies will be awarded. Each choir may choose its own programme, to last not more than thirty minutes. The pieces may be accompanied or not, but it will not be possible to arrange for orchestral accompaniment, if only because of the difficulty of adequate rehearsal. Entries need not be made before April 15.

As the entries for this section are not yet fully made, we cannot give particulars until next month. We understand that Dr. Coward is organizing a large choir recruited from his Leeds and Sheffield choralists.

III.—CHILDREN'S CHOIRS.

As announced in our last issue the Paris Committee has very generously and cordially invited British school children to join the Paris children at the junior competition to be held on Tuesday, May 28. Their first idea was to invite 1,000 children, but after full inquiry as to ways and means it was decided to offer to entertain only 500 children from the London County Council schools.

But while the Paris Committee will undertake to board and lodge only the 500 L.C.C. children, they will welcome school choirs from any other quarter of this country. The following is a translation of an official communication we have received as to this matter:

Any children's choir can compete in this section, providing they meet the whole of their expenses Societies entering Honours Division must fill up Entry Form, but are exempt from all entry fees. This section closes April 15.

Please make it quite clear that all children from England may come and compete and are assured of a hearty welcome, and they will most probably be treated in the same way as the L.C.C. children.

The Council cannot, however, pay expenses, but will look to their comfort and security and provide them with suitable accommodation in schools or other Institutions at minimum rates.

The invitation of the Paris Committee to the children has been carefully considered by the L.C.C. Education Committee, with the result that its acceptance was recommended to the Council. Further the Finance Committee recommend that £600 be allocated to defray the cost of travelling. The children travel on Saturday, May 25, and return on Wednesday, May 29. They will thus have ample time before singing to recover from the fatigue of the journey, and they will be able to spend Monday in seeing the sights of Paris. Dr. Borland will select the choirs from the schools.

At the time of writing it is dubious whether the full Council will consent to the expenditure.

School choirs from Bradford, Blackpool, Leyton (Farmer Road), Barry (South Wales), and elsewhere have intimated their intention to compete.

The following is a revised list of the entries in the classes in which British choirs will compete :

DEATH OF MR. JOHN B. CROOK, OF LYTHAM.

We deeply regret to have to record the sudden and untimely death of this influential supporter of the Competition Festival movement. Mr. Crook founded the Festival that has been established for many years at Lytham (in Lancashire, near Blackpool), and he has been its most active promoter throughout its existence. All concerned with the Lytham Festival will agree that Mr. Crook's unfailing attention to the multifarious duties inseparable from such an undertaking, made the occasion one of the most pleasurable of its kind in the Kingdom. No one connected with the movement saw more broadly and intelligently its social and educational value, or was better able to minimise its difficulties.

Mr. Crook died on Thursday, March 21. He had visited, with his wife and daughter, a matinée of the Carl Rosa Opera Company at Preston during the afternoon, and in the evening, whilst attending a service at a Congregational church, he was suddenly seized with illness and expired within two hours. Many will feel deep sympathy for his family, thus so unexpectedly and sorely afflicted.

LONDONDERRY.—February 27 to March 1.

This event is well supported under the inspiring direction of Mrs. Alexandra Stewart. The following were some of the chief results:

Church Choirs.—First section, tests: anthem, 'The sun shall be no more' (H. H. Woodward), and two hymns; 1st, All Saints,' Clooney. Second section, test: Bunnett's Magnificat, and a hymn, 'Saviour, again to Thy dear name'; 1st, St. Patrick's Church Choir, Coleraine.

Female-Voice Choirs.—Tests: 'Spinning song' (Wagner), 'Spanish gipsy girl' (Lassen). 1st, Mr. S. Weale's choir.

Male-Voice Choirs.—1st, Maiden City Male Choir (Mr. Weale).

Mixed Choirs.—1st, Northern Choir, Derry (Mr. Cunningham).

Juvenile Choirs (five entries).—1st, Mrs. Whale's Belfast Choir (177 marks); 2nd, Derry Cathedral School (170 marks).

Large National School Choirs (three entries).—1st, West Derry Cathedral boys (171 marks); 2nd, Sion Mills (161 marks).

Junior Action-Song (three entries).—1st, Derry Cathedral infants (58 marks).

Juvenile Temperance Choirs (five entries).—1st, Great James Street Presbyterian Church, Londonderry.

National School Choirs (second division).—1st, Stewart Schools, Londonderry.

Senior Action-Song (nine entries).—1st, Sion Mills (53 marks); 2nd, Mrs. Whale's pupils, Belfast (52 marks); 3rd, First Derry Boys' Brigade (51 marks); 4th, Derry Cathedral.

In the Small National School Choir section Cloughcor National School was first. In other school classes West Derry Cathedral Boys, Stewart Schools (Londonderry), Sion Mills, and Derry Cathedral Infants were respectively winners.

Mr. T. Tertius Noble adjudicated.

ALDERSHOT.—February 29.

The Naval and Military Musical Union held their final contest for the Challenge Championship Cup at Aldershot, on February 29.

The 31st Field Artillery Brigade, Aldershot; the Royal Engineers, Chatham; the Royal Marine Light Infantry, Portsmouth; and His Majesty's ship 'Essex' were the competing parties.

A preliminary contest was first entered upon for the two last-named, who had not previously won a local competition.

The 'John Farmer Cup' was eventually won by the Chatham Royal Engineers. The 'Essex' came second, and the Artillery Brigade third.

PUDSEY.—March 2.

There were five classes in this competition, four for vocal and pianoforte soloists, and one for mixed-voice choirs. The following were the winners:—Pianoforte, H. Wigglesworth; Boy soloist, G. Jowett; Contralto, Miss Alice Haley; Baritone, Mr. Leonard Mitchell; Choirs, test: 'The soul's longing' (F. James)—1st, Thornton Vocal Union (Mr. W. L. Ashton).

Mr. Newton Laycock adjudicated.

SOUTH LONDON FESTIVAL.

March 2, 4, 6, 7, 9.

This event attracted a great number of competitors in the numerous classes. Its operations make an appeal to a very wide district. It is admirably managed by Mr. T. Lester Jones, the secretary, and his better-half, who are both assiduous in dealing with the mass of detail involved in the business. We can only afford space to register the chief results, which were as follows:

Open Choral Championship, Willesden District Choir (conductor, Mr. J. S. Waddell); The Kimber Shield (open choral class); Essendine Choir, Paddington, for the fourth successive year (conductor, Mr. William Kendall); South of the Thames Choral Championship, Woolwich Co-operative Choral Society, second successive year (conductor, Mr. John Hines); the London Shield Competition (girls' clubs), The King Edward Institute, Spitalfields (conductor, Madame Kate Nicholls; Lord Llangattock Class (ladies), Willesden District Choir (conductor, Mr. T. S. Waddell); Elementary School Choir (boys), first prize, Swaffield Road, Wandsworth London County Council School, third year (conductor, Mr. Keys); School Orchestra (first and second violins and pianoforte), first prize, Balham School of Music (conductor, Signor Coviello); Elementary School Choir (girls), first prize, Swaffield Road London County Council School, second year (conductor, Mrs. Soper); Choirs of Equal Voices, first prize, Balham School of Music; School Ochestras, first prize, Balham School of Music; Men's Choirs (Open Competition), first prize, Wandsworth Male-Voice Choir (conductor, Mr. H. Wharton Wells); String Orchestra, first prize, Balham School of Music (conductor, Signor Coviello); Combined Men's Choirs, Wandsworth Male-Voice Choir, Camberwell Choral Society, Essendine Choir, Willesden Choir, and Wood Green Men's Adult School (conductor, Dr. G. F. Huntley); Church Choirs (mixed), first prize, Anerley Wesleyan Church Choir (conductor, Mr. A. J. Heard Norrish). The prizes were distributed at the Crystal Palace, on March 16, by Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein and Sir John Kirk, the former in the afternoon and the latter in the evening.

The adjudicators were Dr. Abernethy, Mr. H. R. Bird, Dr. Borland, Dr. Frost, Mr. Alfred Gibson, Mr. Herbert Hodge, Dr. Huntley, Dr. Walmsley Little, Dr. W. G. McNaught, Herr Hans Neumann, Mr. Dan Price, and Mr Richard Temple.

FIFE MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—March 8 and 9.

This new Festival (begun in 1911) suffered some disadvantage from the unrest of the coal strike, but it showed promise. The enthusiasm of competitors and audience was very encouraging.

The Children's Choirs sang four Scotch national songs and Colinsburgh Public School (Mr. Thomas Clark) came out first. In another school class, Ferryport-on-Craig (Mr. Robert Wedderspoon) was successful. The Choral Societies sang a chorus selected from 'As the hart pants' (Mendelssohn) and Newport Choral Society (Mr. R. Scott) was first. In a Madrigal Class, Cupar (Mr. J. M. Cooper) was first and Newport (Mr. R. Scott) was second. The Newport Society was also successful in the Male-voice and the Female-voice sections.

Dr. R. Vaughan Williams adjudicated.

MANCHESTER TONIC SOL-FA FESTIVAL.

(from our own correspondent.)

March 9.

The twelfth annual Manchester District Tonic Sol-fa Festival was held under the joint auspices of the Salford Municipal Entertainment Committee and the Manchester and District Tonic Sol-fa Association. The day's programme included juvenile solo (four classes), duet and individual ear-test competitions, in addition to a juvenile choral contest for the 'Alderman Keevney' Challenge Shield, in which the following five choirs sang in the order named :

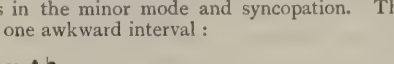
		Marks.
	Seedley Council School (Mr. J. W. Stacey) ...	82
1st.	Swinton Juvenile Choir (Eccles Co-operative) (Mr. James Currie)...	89
3rd.	Halton Bank Council School (Mr. Jno. J. Ireland)	86
	Tootal Road Council School (Mr. J. E. Davis)	85
2nd.	Grecian Street Council School (Mr. G. S. Smith)	88

Each choir sang Coleridge-Taylor's 'Drake's Drum' and a two-part sight-test, including chromatic tones, half-pulse notes, phrases in the minor mode and syncopation. This test embraced one awkward interval :



at which most of the choirs stumbled, Tootal Road being the first to sing it correctly, though they took it too slowly, about M. 60 instead of M. 100 as indicated. Grecian Street then went one better by giving it both correctly and at the right tempo. The judge's decision therefore, placing these two choirs second and fourth respectively, evoked no little surprise.

Only one choir having entered in the Adult Choral Competition for the 'Frankenburg' Challenge Shield, this contest fell through ; and the Grecian Street School wound up the Festival with an ideal performance of Facer's cantata, 'The Sons of the Empire' (in costume)—this being the third performance of this work given by the school this season.

THE WANSBECK FESTIVAL, MORPETH (NORTHUMBERLAND).—March 15 and 16.

This Festival was held successfully, notwithstanding the distraction of the coal strike.

On the first day Junior Competitions were held. The following were the chief results :

School Classes.—Tests : Unison song, 'The sheep shearing' ; two-part song, 'All seek for rest.' 1st, Mitford.

Challenge Shield Class.—Tests : Unison song, 'Land to the leeward, ho!' (Parry) ; 'Whispering winds' (Labbett). 1st, Morpeth Corporation Girls.

On the second day adult choirs sang. In the Anthem Class, the test in which was 'Awake, thou that sleepest' (Stainer), Netherwitton was first.

Choral Societies.—Test : Unison chorus from 'Lauda Sion' (Mendelssohn). Felton was first in this section, as well as in another choral section.

In the Chief Choral Class, in which the tests were 'In pride of May' (Weelkes) and 'Hymn to music' (Dudley Buck), the Ashington Harmonic gave a fine performance.

In the Female-Voice Choir Class, in which the test was 'Flow down, cold rivulet' (Luard-Selby), Ashington was first.

In the smaller Male-Voice Choir section Longframlington was first. There was only one entry in the large Male-Voice Choir Class. The tests were 'Hymn before action' (Davies) and 'After many a dusty mile' (Elgar). Morpeth Y.M.C.A. Choir gave high-grade performances.

A performance of Mendelssohn's 'Lauda Sion' concluded the proceedings. Dr. McNaught adjudicated, and conducted the combined choirs.

The Stratford and East London Festival was held on March 16, 18, 19, 20-23. The success of the event was unprecedented. We are compelled to withhold a report of the results until our next number.

MIDLAND MUSICAL COMPETITION FESTIVAL.

Birmingham, May 14 to 18.

The attention of our readers is called to the announcement in our advertisement columns that all entries for the above Festival must be in the hands of the hon. secretaries not later than April 3. Local choirs will be interested to learn that except on Saturday all adult choir competitions will take place in the evenings. The number of adjudicators shows the confidence of the executive in the success of the Festival, the following having been appointed up to the date of going to press : Dr. W. G. McNaught, Dr. H. P. Allen, Dr. A. Herbert Brewer, Mr. Rawdon Briggs, Mr. Harry Evans, Mrs. G. M. Kapp, Mr. Willy Lehmann, and Mr. Edwin Stephenson. We learn that in addition to the trophies announced in the syllabus, the proprietors of the Birmingham Daily Post have offered shields for Classes 51, 52, and 53, and the proprietors of the Daily News (Midland edition) for Class 4.

We are asked to remedy an omission from the syllabus by stating that the number of singers in choirs in Classes 92, 93, and 94 are the same as for Classes 87, 88, and 89 respectively.

Arrangements are being made with the railway companies for cheap tickets to be issued to all competitors.

Further information can be obtained from the Hon. Secretaries, Queen's College, Birmingham.

The Manx (Isle of Man) Festival, held on March 19 to 21 at Douglas, was made a special event this year, because 1912 is the twenty-first anniversary of its establishment. The chief results will be reported in our next issue.

In the report of the Huddersfield (Mrs. Sunderland) competition, it should have been stated that Mr. Joseph Butterworth gained the violin prize and the 'Sunderland medal.'

We are glad to hear that the West Lindsey Competition, which begins its career at Gainsborough on April 24 and 25, has numerous entries and every prospect of success.

DATES OF COMPETITIONS AND NAMES OF SECRETARIES.

Chipping Norton (Stour Choral Union).—April 16 and 17. Miss Ruth Dickins, Cherington, Shipston-on-Stour.

Kendal (Westmorland Festival).—April 16 to 19. Messrs. Colin and Gordon Somervell, Netherfield, Kendal.

Uttoxeter (Dove and Churnet Valleys).—April 16, 17. Mr. A. Rawlinson Wood, Mus. Bac., Durstone College, Staffordshire.

Sandy (Eisteddfod).—April 18. Mr. J. Milliner, Bedford Road, Sandy.

Oswestry (Village Choirs).—April 18 (provisional). Mr. W. G. D. Thompson, 3, Edward Street.

Perth.—April 19, 20, 21. Rev. Archibald Main, St. Madoes Manse, Glencarse.

Oundle.—April 19, 20. Lady Lilford, Lilford Hall.

York.—April 20, 22, 23. Mr. E. C. Brooksbank, Healaugh Old Hall, Tadcaster.

Retford (The North Notts Competition).—April 20, 22, 23, 24. Miss Hermione Harcourt Vernon, Grove Hall, Retford.

Petersfield.—April 23, 24, 25. Miss Grace Keily, Morelands, Purbrook, Hants.

Brigg (N. Lincolnshire).—April 23, 24. Lady Winefride Elwes, Brigg.

South Somerset, Yeovil.—April 23, 24, 25. Miss Traske, Courtfield, Norton-sub-Handon, Somerset.

song, 'In the silent West,' and a set of Northumbrian folk-tunes. Mr. Louis Pecskai and Madame Steenberg played violin and pianoforte Sonatas by Beethoven and Grieg.

The South Shields Choral Society (Mr. M. Fairs) gave Cowen's 'John Gilpin' and a miscellaneous programme on March 13, and on Friday, March 15, the Students' Choral Society of the Armstrong College gave their annual concert. Bach's Ascension cantata, 'Praise Jehovah' (soloists, Madame M. Wyatt, Miss R. Burn, Messrs. E. Kellet and E. J. Potts), and Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' were the main items, and the choir also sang two Debussy chansons and three Northumbrian folk-tunes.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

The last orchestral concert of the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society took place on February 22. The soloist was Mr. Morgan Kingston, a native of the shire, whose voice was heard to advantage in Don José's song from 'Carmen' and Sullivan's 'Sailor's grave.' The other items included the 'Oberon' Overture (Weber), and 'Finlandia' (Sibelius). New to the audience were 'Till Eulenspiegel' (Strauss), 'Sursum Corda' (Elgar), and a Suite for orchestra by another Nottinghamshire native, Eric Coates, which created a very favourable impression. A noticeable feature of the concert as a whole was the purity of the tone, in which respect it has never been so clear. Mr. Allen Gill directed his forces through a difficult programme with great ability, and Mr. Wynne Reeves proved a very able leader.

OXFORD.

The first concert of the term took place in the Assembly Room of the Town Hall on January 27, when Mr. A. J. Slocombe and his confrères gave a very good chamber concert devoted to the works of Schumann, and three weeks later he gave a Brahms concert on the same lines. The principal item at the earlier concert was the Quartet in E flat, Op. 47, and at the latter the Clarinet quintet, Op. 115.

On February 8, in the Town Hall, under the auspices of the Musical Club, a capital orchestral concert was given under Dr. Allen's direction, opening with Mozart's Symphony in G minor, the interpretation of which was thoroughly excellent. Two modern works were performed for the first time, symphonic variations entitled 'Normandy,' for pianoforte and orchestra, by A. Somervell, and two Idylls on English Folk-tunes, by G. S. Butterworth, the concert ending with Brahms's superbly magnificent Variations on a theme by Haydn, Op. 56.

It is only necessary to record the fact that Mr. Plunket Greene gave one of his now familiar lectures on 'Songs and their classification' on February 15, in the Assembly Room of the Town Hall, to an appreciative audience.

On February 22, in the same room, Miss Stella Carol gave a concert, and charmed everyone with her pure vocal tone and simplicity of manner.

On February 27, in the Town Hall, under the auspices of the Musical Club, the 'Brussels' String Quartet gave a delightful concert, the programme opening with Beethoven's beautiful Quartet in F major, Op. 59, No. 1, followed by Debussy's Quartet in G minor, Op. 10, and concluding with Dvorák's picturesque Quartet in F major, Op. 96.

On March 12, in the Sheldonian Theatre, the Professor of Music, Sir Walter Parratt, gave his terminal lecture, the subject being 'Melody in Music.' The genial Professor caused some amusement by saying that he had chosen not only a wide but an exceedingly tender subject, for many of our present-day composers would not write a bar of melody if they could, and many of them also could not write a bar of it if they would! This might sound sarcastic, said the Professor, but all the same it was perfectly true. Early examples of fragments of melody of various nationalities were played by Sir Walter on the pianoforte, and the vocal portions were nicely sung by Miss A. Christa.

On the following day Bach's Passion music (according to 'St. John') was given by the Bach Choir, under the able conductorship of Dr. Allen, in Merton College Chapel, the soloists being Miss Ruth Freeman, the Hon. Norah Dawnay, Mr. Charles Child, and Mr. Frederick Keel, all of whom sang excellently. The singing of some of the choruses was perhaps a little marred by the choir being of necessity placed on a level, and the intonation became variable; still, the performance as a whole was very good. By the kind invitation of the Mayor, the performance was repeated in the Town Hall on the following Sunday evening for the benefit of the working classes, admission being free. Needless to say, this kindness of the Mayor, of Dr. Allen, and of all the performers, was most warmly appreciated.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The experiment of combining the Choral Societies of Doncaster and Rotherham in the performance of some mutually prepared work has proved so successful that it has become a permanent arrangement for one concert in each town every year. There is much to be said for an experiment which effects, by amalgamation under one conductor, more finished and balanced performances and a desirable economy in the concert expenses. By this means certain works, inaccessible when each Society stands alone, are brought within reach of these two excellently managed organizations. Though the last remark hardly applies to 'Elijah,' performed in both towns during the past month, yet the doubling of the choral force materially enhanced the effects of the singing. In the big cumulative choruses the results were imposing. In details and finish the respective Societies have never done better, or so well. Mr. Brameld, the conductor, is at his best when dealing with broad choral strains, and in Mendelssohn's music he finds a congenial scope for his infectious enthusiasm. There was a small but competent orchestra. Mr. Charles Tree sang in the title-part, and the other soloists were Miss Alice Baxter, Miss Elsie Frood, and Mr. Joseph Reed.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' (Parts 1 and 2), furnished the Victoria Hall Choral Society with congenial study, and resulted in an access of new members. Mr. H. C. Jackson directed a hearty and fairly correct performance, which marked an advance on previous chorus singing, and only needed further attention to the niceties of expression to win warm praise. The orchestra, though not so good as the choir, played with zest and precision. The soloists were Madame Wathen-Cole, Mr. George Riley, and Mr. Joseph Lycett.

Excellent concerts of male-voice music have been given during the month by the Sheffield Male Glee and Madrigal Society (conductor Mr. W. H. Robinson) and the Sheffield Cambrian Male-voice Choir.

A flourishing district choral body, the Chapeltown Sacred Harmonic Society, sang in a 'triple bill' with considerable success. There was excellent massed volume of tone in Mendelssohn's '95th Psalm' and Beethoven's 'Mount of Olives.' Weber's Mass in G was also included in the programme. Mr. M. Thompson conducted.

At the last orchestral Sheffield Promenade Concert, Mr. J. A. Rodgers conducted performances of Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony, Beethoven's 'Egmont' Overture, Saint-Saëns's 'Le Rouet d'Omphale,' and two movements from Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' music. Mr. Cecil Baumer was the soloist in Rubinstein's Pianoforte concerto in D minor. The orchestra played with still further delicacy and cohesion. The audience was the largest of the series, and the concert may be counted as the best hitherto given. Mr. D'Auvergne Upcher sang songs by Schubert and Quilter very expressively.

Among the remaining musical events of a full and varied month may be named the visit of Mr. Nikisch and the London Symphony Orchestra in the course of their tour; two successful organ recitals, by Mr. E. H. Lemare, at the Albert Hall; a performance of Romberg's 'Lay of the Bell,' by the South Street Church Choir (directed by Mr. W. S. Skelton); the last concert of the Sheffield Subscription series, at which Miss Julia Culp and Mr. Busoni were the chief performers; and an interesting lecture, by Dr. Walford Davies, on 'Music and Human Nature.'

YORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.

Two important works by native composers have been introduced to Leeds during the past month. On March 13, the Choral Union gave Cowen's 'The Veil,' with Miss Susan Strong, Miss Elsie Bradley, Messrs. Brearley and Herbert Brown as the principals. It was a fine performance on the choral side, and the soloists were all well suited to their task. Dr. Coward conducted. On March 20, the Philharmonic Society gave, together with Mozart's 'Requiem,' the first performance at Leeds of Bantock's 'Omar Khàyyam (Part 2), under the direction of Mr. Fricker. The solo parts were taken by Miss Jenny Taggart, Miss Grainger-Kerr, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. Both works had justice done to them, and a high degree of finish was attained, the playing of the orchestra of local musicians being most creditable, while the choir showed refinement as well as force.

At the last of the Rasch Quartet Concerts, on February 28, a fine reading, distinguished by warmth and freedom, of Beethoven's great Quartet in C sharp minor (Op. 131) was the feature of the occasion, Tchaikovsky's Quartet in D (Op. 11) being the other work given. It is satisfactory to note the increasing audiences at these concerts, and the great appreciation that is shown. On March 6 the Leeds Bohemian Quartet introduced, for the first time at Leeds, Glazounow's 'Slavonic' Quartet in G, and Sinigaglia's 'Study' in D, the colour and verve of both being happily realised. At Messrs. Mason and Maude's recital on March 15, Sonatas for violin and pianoforte by Mozart (A minor), Brahms (D minor), and Beethoven (the 'Kreutzer'), with songs contributed by Madame Susan Cover, formed the programme. Miss Kathleen Smith gave her second pianoforte recital on February 26, including in her programme a Beethoven Sonata (Op. 13), and Busoni's transcription of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in D, together with pieces by Schumann, Chopin and Debussy. On March 11, Mr. Fred Dawson came to his native town to give a pianoforte recital, playing with his accustomed brilliance a most interesting programme, which included the so-called 'Moonlight' Sonata, Schumann's great Fantasie (Op. 17), and in the second part afforded a historical glimpse of the development of pianoforte music. On February 26, Madame Albani, with a concert party, came to Leeds to pay her farewell to a town where, at the Festivals, she long reigned supreme.

The visit of Mr. Denhof's Opera Company (March 18-23), which was the event of the season, is dealt with elsewhere, and mention should also be made of the appearance of that great artist, Madame Pavlova, and a company of Russian dancers (March 4-9).

BRADFORD.

At Bradford the Subscription Concert on March 7 was the occasion of the visit of Mr. Nikisch and the London Symphony Orchestra, who played the same programme of familiar pieces (the 'Unfinished' Symphony, some Wagner pieces, &c.) which theyhave been giving throughout their provincial tour, and naturally played it to perfection. They also appeared at Huddersfield on March 6. On February 27, the Bradford Old Choral Society gave an efficient performance, under Mr. E. J. Pickles, of the 'Walpurgis Night,' with Miss Verena Fancourt, Mr. Harold Wilde, Mr. A. Lee, and Mr. Robert Charlesworth as soloists. On March 1, the Festival Choral Society gave, for the first time in Yorkshire, 'The Veil,' which had the advantage of being under the composer's direction, since Sir Frederic Cowen is conductor of the Society. It was admirably done, the principals, Miss Jenny Taggart, Miss Gwladys Roberts, Mr. d'Oisly, and Mr. Herbert Brown, being excellent in the solo parts, and the choir and orchestra (that of the the Bradford Permanent Orchestra) at their best. Mr. Midgley's experiment in 'Free Chamber Concerts' is being continued with great success; the audiences are large and very attentive. On March 11, a programme, which included a Motet by Palestrina, part-songs by Brahms, Debussy and Tinel, and the famous 'Liebeslieder Waltzes' of Brahms, attracted an overflowing audience, whilst in the way of instrumental music they had Violin and Pianoforte sonatas by Mozart and Franck—a liberal allowance for a 'free' concert. On March 16, the Bradford Permanent Orchestra brought its twentieth season to a close. Mr. Julian Clifford was the conductor on this occasion, and the programme included Beethoven's fifth Symphony, the 'Siegfried Idyll,' and popular overtures by Weber and Mendelssohn.

OTHER TOWNS.

Of the 'other towns' of Yorkshire, Halifax may this time enjoy the pride of place, for it has given two remarkably demonstrations of choral work during the past month. The concert of Bantock's unaccompanied vocal music, given be the Madrigal Society on March 9, is dealt with elsewhere; two days earlier, on March 7, the Choral Society gave 'The Dream of Gerontius' for the first time at Halifax, and, under Mr. Fricker's direction, achieved a very great success. The choir sang in a fashion which showed the result of very thorough rehearsal, the orchestra (of West Riding musicians) played with admirable style and finish, and the principals, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. William Higley, were thoroughly adequate. Altogether the finish and the nice feeling of the performance deserved high praise, and was the more satisfactory since it was, but for the principals, accomplished with purely local resources. On March 1, at the last of the chamber concerts given by the Rawdon Briggs Quartet, Quartets by Beethoven and Schumann and Dvorák's Terzetto (Op. 74) were performed. On March 14, the Halifax Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. H. van Dÿk, gave a popular programme that included the 'Peer Gynt' Suite, familiar Overtures by Beethoven, Rossini, and Mendelssohn, and some orchestral 'tit-bits,' which were nicely played and received with favour. For an orchestra which is almost entirely amateur in its composition, a high level of excellence has been attained.

The Huddersfield Subscription Concert on March 6 was the occasion of Nikisch's visit, as mentioned above. On March 8, the Choral Society gave Brahms's 'German Requiem,' which, though Dr. Hull has performed it at the Parish Church, had never before been attempted by the Society, a fact which argues a certain want of artistic enterprise in so important an institution. Under Dr. Coward a powerful reading was afforded, though still lacking something in subtlety. The more strenuous choruses were however sung with tremendous vigour, and had a fine effect. The principals were Miss Caroline Hatchard and Mr. George Baker. On February 27, the Glee and Madrigal Society gave one of their concerts, consisting chiefly of unaccompanied vocal music, Mr. J. E. Ibeson conducting some refined performances.

The 'German Requiem' was introduced to Dewsbury at a special service in the Parish Church on March 12, and was very creditably sung by an enlarged choir under the conductorship of the organist, Mr. G. H. Hirst, Mr. Bernard Johnson being at the organ.

At Harrogate an interesting pianoforte recital was given on February 24 by Mr. Lloyd Hartley, who is taking up the work of the late Mr. Max Blume in this town. In the 'Waldstein' Sonata and in a number of Chopin pieces he showed himself to be a player of poetic feeling.

On March 2, Madame Albani gave her farewell concert at Harrogate, and on March 15 the Choral Society, under Mr. C. L. Naylor, performed 'Elijah.' Mr. Charles Tree was a dramatic Elijah, and Miss James, Miss Godley, and Mr. Halstead were the other principals.

In my reference, a month ago, to the Leeds Philharmonic performance of Elgar's new Symphony as 'the first in the West Riding,' I forgot that Mr. Julian Clifford had given it at Harrogate in August of last year.

The York Symphony Orchestra attracted a great crowd to the spacious Exhibition Building on March 11, when Mr. Plunket Greene sang Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet,' and the orchestra showed artistic ambition in attempting Beethoven's C minor Symphony, a difficult task for amateurs, which, however, they accomplished most creditably. Mr. T. Tertius Noble, the conductor, deserves praise for having trained his players so well. He also conducted the York Choral Society in 'The Creation,' on March 20.

On March 2, the Hull Harmonic Society made a bid for popularity by giving a concert performance of Gounod's 'Faust,' with Madame Gleeson-White as the Margaret. Mr. Robert Burnett as Mephisto, with Miss Clytie Hine and Mr. Webster Millar, took the other principal parts, and Mr. Porter conducted. Under Mr. J. W. Hudson, the Hull Philharmonic Society gave, on March 8, the 'Unfinished' Symphony, and Mr. Berkeley Mason, a local musician, played the solo part in a creditable performance of Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Pianoforte concerto. Miss Marie Stevens was the vocalist.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ABERDEEN.—At the commencement of the present season the council of the Aberdeen Choral Union decided to carry out a re-test of the whole membership. The wisdom of the plan was indicated at the concert held on Tuesday, February 13, when the newly-constituted choir gave proof of its quality in an excellent concert-performance of Bizet's 'Carmen.' The principal soloists were Miss Doris Woodall, Miss Margaret Skakle, Mr. Maurice d'Oisly, and Mr. Graham Marr. Elgar's 'The Kingdom,' now in rehearsal, is the principal work in next season's programme. A most successful performance of the 'Messiah' was given by the Choral Union on March 10, before a crowded audience. The proceeds were for the widows and children of the men who perished in the gale of February last. The orchestra included most of the professional orchestral players of the city, who along with the soloists gave their services gratuitously. The soloists were Miss Margaret Skakle, Mrs. Kirby, Mr. Charles Soutar and Mr. E. T. Warnock; organist, Mr. J. Cooper. Mr. A. Collingwood conducted both concerts.——The concert given by the University Choral and Orchestral Society, under Professor C. S. Terry's direction, on February 23, had the customary distinction in programme and performance. The second Act of Gluck's 'Orpheus' was the principal feature. The miscellaneous selection included Stanford's 'Farewell, my joy,' and 'The witch,' Bantock's 'A love song,' Walford Davies's 'One old Oxford Ox,' Parry's 'Out upon it,' and a Pastorale, 'Rays of evening sun descending,' by Professor Terry. The orchestra played the 'Meistersinger' and 'Oberon' Overtures, and Elgar's 'Sursum Corda.'

AYTON (N.B.).—For their eighth season the Choral Association showed marked improvement in tone, attack and general expression in their performance of Prout's '100th Psalm' and Bridge's 'Ballad of the Clampherdown,' under the able direction of Mr. George Allan. A small but effective string band, with pianoforte and organ, supplied the accompaniments. The soloists on this occasion were Miss Dorothy Foster, Miss Wilson, Mr. Cowell, and Mr. J. M. Scott.

BRIERLEY HILL.—The Brockmoor Male-Voice Choir, now in its second year of existence, gave a pleasant concert on March 6, at the Town Hall. Under Mr. Arthur Woodall's direction the choir gave attractive interpretations of C. A. Mager's 'Hymn of Progress,' German's 'O peaceful night,' Gounod's 'By Babylon's wave' (as arranged by Percy Fletcher), and other works. The solo vocalists were Madame Aston, Miss Emily Rudge, and Mr. Arthur Carder, and violoncello solos were given by Mr. Percy Hall.

BRIGHTON.—'King Olaf' was admirably performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society at the Dome on March 14, under the direction of Mr. Robert Taylor, who drew many striking effects from his responsive forces. The Municipal Orchestra supplied the accompaniment, and the solos were given by Miss Carrie Tubb, Mr. Turnpenney, and Mr. Jackson Potter.

CALNE (WILTS).—The annual concert of the Musical Society (now in its twenty-sixth season) was held in the Town Hall on February 20, the works performed being Spohr's 'Last Judgment,' and Barnett's 'Ancient Mariner.' The band and choir were under the conductorship of Mr. W. R. Pullein, and the principal artists were Miss Florence Fleming, Miss Mary Wood, Mr. Albert Watson, and Mr. John Prout.

CANTERBURY.—The second concert of the East Kent Orchestral Society took place under Mr. Percy Godfrey's direction at the Foresters' Hall on February 17. The programme included an interesting 'Suite Romanesque' for strings by Mr. Godfrey, which was well played and well received. The vocalists were Miss Mabel Parham, Mrs. Frank Ramsey, and Mr. Sidney Coltham.——A chamber concert, directed by Mr. Percy Godfrey and Mr. W. T. Harvey, was given at Gaywood's Rooms on March 6. Schubert's rarely-heard Octette and a Quintette for oboe, clarinet, trumpet, horn and pianoforte by Mr. Godfrey provided the programme. The latter work proved of considerable brilliance and attractiveness. Songs were given by Mrs. Wright Hunt.

CORSHAM (WILTS).—The Corsham Choral Society gave a most satisfactory performance of Brahms's 'Requiem,' in the Methuen Hall, on February 27. The soloists were Miss Hilda Blake (Bath) and Mr. Joseph E. Farrington (St. Paul's Cathedral). Both gave devotional and artistic interpretations of their parts. The band and choir, numbering seventy performers, were remarkably efficient, and showed that the difficulties of this noble work may, with persistent effort, be overcome by a choral Society of a small country town of some 4,000 inhabitants. By request the work was given on March 13 in the Parish Church before a crowded congregation. On this occasion the bass solos were efficiently sung by Mr. C. E. Poole (Bath), Mr. Herbert Spackman was leader of the orchestra, and Mr. Lewin Spackman (organist of the Parish Church) conducted.

CRAVEN ARMS.—A performance was given on Wednesday, February 14, of Romberg's 'Lay of the Bell' by the Craven Arms and District Choral Society, at their fourteenth concert. The soloists were Miss Warner, Dr. Barnett, Mr. S. Valentine and Mr. W. Bradford, of Leominster. The last-named took the part of 'the Master.' There was a miscellaneous second part, during which Miss Monique Poole played violin pieces and the choir sang part-songs.

DARTFORD.—The Dartford and District Choral and Orchestral Society gave their fourth annual concert at the Conservative Hall, Dartford, on February 20, before a large and enthusiastic audience, under the conductorship of Mr. David Mackenzie. The first part of the programme consisted of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's departure,' of which work a most satisfactory interpretation was given. The solo parts were undertaken by Miss Madge Brown, Mr. Ronald Marshall, and Mr. John Kimber. The second part included Mendelssohn's Overture, 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' Adolf Jensen's 'Rest comes at eve,' and the Choral March from 'Tannhäuser.' Dr. J. L. Miskin gave a violoncello solo.

DERBY.—Exceptionally fine performances of 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'The golden legend' were given by the Choral Union on March 12. Mr. Lyell-Taylor, who conducted, threw great spirit into his readings, and met with an adequate response from the choir. An excellent orchestra accompanied, and solo parts were taken by Miss Euneta Truscott, Mr. J. W. King, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. Peter Dawson.

EAST GRINSTEAD.—The high standard attained by the forty players who form the East Grinstead Orchestral Society was exemplified in a concert given under Mr. N. E. Hope's direction at Whitehall on February 20. Excellent performances of Beethoven's eighth Symphony, Mozart's 'Don Juan' Overture and other works were given. Solo numbers were contributed by Miss Gertrude Blatch, Mr. E. Waite (vocalists) and Mr. Percy Sharman (violinist).

EASTBOURNE.—Mr. Norfolk Megone has been appointed musical director of the Devonshire Park Company, Eastbourne. The season, which opens at Easter and will continue until November, promises to be an unusually brilliant one. Two orchestral and vocal concerts will be given daily, including Sundays.

FORFAR.—A highly-satisfactory performance of 'King Olaf' was given by the Choral Union on March 7. Mr. Stephen Richardson conducted ably, and secured an expressive interpretation. The solo parts were taken by Miss Emily Breare, Mr. Frank Webster and Mr. Thorpe Bates. The miscellaneous programme included Mendelssohn's 'Hebrides' Overture.

GUERNSEY.—The annual concerts of the Guille-Allès Choral and Orchestral Association were given in St. George's Hall on March 5 and 6. At the first concert a creditable performance of Sir Edward Elgar's 'Caractacus' was given before a large and enthusiastic audience. The preparation of this fine work had given much pleasure to band and choir. On the second evening Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' was excellently performed. The audience was again very large. The soloists in both works were Miss Mabel Manson, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs, and Mr. Julien Henry. Miss Alice Lakin also sang the contralto music in 'Elijah.' Mr. John David conducted as usual, and Mrs. Noel accompanied.

Kingston (Jamaica).—As an example of keenness and enterprise the concert given on January 31 by the nine singers who form the Kingston Glee Singers, directed by Mr. George D. Goode, was quite notable. The programme included Arcadelt's 'Now Spring in all her glory,' Lloyd's 'The battle of the Baltic,' Atterbury's 'Come, let us all a-maying go,' Elgar's 'My love dwelt in a northern land,' Lee Williams's 'Song of the pedlar,' Sullivan's 'O hush thee, my babie,' Webbe's 'Glorious Apollo,' for male voices, Schubert's 'Coronach' for female voices; and the anthems 'Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake,' by Farrant, 'God is a Spirit,' by Sterndale Bennett, and 'By Babylon's wave,' by Gounod. The singing was, from all accounts, admirable.

Kirkcaldy.—The Musical Society gave a successful performance of Haydn's 'Creation' on March 13. The soloists were Miss Mabel Manson, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. A professional orchestra of thirty, under the leadership of Mr. W. H. Cole, supplied the accompaniments. Mr. Gray, the Corporation organist, presided at the organ, and Mr. Charles W. Cowe conducted.

Lancaster.—An admirable concert was given by Mr. Aldous's Choir. The programme included some favourite competition test-pieces, chief among which were Wilbye's 'Sweet honey-sucking bees' and Elgar's 'Go, song of mine.' The choir sang with all the exquisite art to which they owe their position. The soloists of the occasion were Miss Lorna Stamm (soprano) and Miss Maud Dunington (violoncello).

Landore (South Wales).—The enterprise and serious purpose of the New Siloh Choir found expression on March 8 in a very creditable performance of Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater,' under the direction of Mr. John Lewis. The programme also provided a contrast with Goring Thomas's 'The swan and the skylark.' The principal artists were Miss Mary Lindsay, Miss Winifred Lewis, Mr. Joseph Cheetham and Mr. David Hughes. Mr. Ivor Owen was the organist.

Lichfield.—The already widespread popularity of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' was increased by a performance given on February 20, by the Lichfield Musical Society under Mr. J. B. Lott. The choralists threw themselves heartily into their task, and showed keen appreciation of the music. Madame Aston, Mrs. Mercer, Mr. C. W. Fredericks and Mr. Herbert Parker were the soloists. The choir was also heard to advantage in Fletcher's 'Indian Bride' and in Dudley Buck's 'Hark, the trumpet calleth'; and the orchestra in Tchaikovsky's 'Casse-noisette' suite.

Loughborough.—'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' was the chief work sung by the Choral Society at their concert on March 6, and under Mr. Frank Storer's direction it received a performance of striking merit. The same level was attained by the soloists, Miss Lysette Mostyn and Mr. Frank Webster, and by the orchestra, which was also heard independently in Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony and other works. The miscellaneous choral selection included 'Where is the sea,' by Mr. Storer.

Newcastle (Staffs.).—At a concert given by Mr. S. F. Lovatt's male-voice choir, on February 15, two new part-songs by the conductor were performed and made an excellent impression. They were entitled 'Love is a hunter boy' and 'The exile.' The solo artists of the occasion were M. Zacharewitsch, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, and Mr. Anderson Nicol.

Newport.—A notable concert was given by an orchestra of sixty performers under the direction of Mr. A. W. Bartholomew, at the Central Hall, on February 29. Striking performances of Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony, Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch' and other works were given. Solo music was provided by Miss Marie Novello (pianist) and Miss Winifred Lewis (contralto).

Perth.—Elgar's 'King Olaf' was performed for the first time in Perth by Mr. Richardson's Choral Society on February 20. The choral singing had great vitality and expressiveness, and in the dramatic sections was attractively vivid. The solo parts were taken by Miss Perceval Allen, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. Charles Tree. Mr. Stephen Richardson showed great ability in handling his resources, which consisted of 150 singers and forty instrumentalists.—On March 4, at a musical evening held by the members of the Musical Society in the Synod Hall, Mr. F. S. Graves was made the recipient of a handsome illuminated address and a purse of sovereigns, on the completion of twenty-five years' strenuous and successful work as conductor of the Society.

Rhosllanerchrugog, (N. Wales).—On Wednesday, February 28, an excellent performance of Spohr's 'Last Judgment' was given at Bethlehem Congregational Church by the Bethlehem United Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Dan. Roberts. The principals were Miss Jennie Ellis, Madame Annie Hargreaves, Mr. John Collet, and Mr. Herbert Brown. The organist was Dr. Caradog Roberts. An interesting feature of the second miscellaneous part was the first performance of some of Dr. Caradog Roberts's new compositions.

The Lake District.—The fourth series of the 'George Rathbone' chamber concerts was given on March 13-16, at Carnforth, Kendal, Windermere and Grange. On this occasion Mr. Rathbone gave pianoforte recitals with vocal solos by Miss Beatrice Wilson. After the great success the clever pianist made at the Promenade Concerts last autumn, much interest was shown in his appearance at these recitals; without doubt he had added considerably to his reputation. His pianoforte playing is of a distinguished character. He is able by the charm of his tone and real musical temperament to hold the attention of his audience in a most remarkable manner. His programme included a 'Scherzo Fantastique' of his own, a brilliant, effective and difficult work finely played. We hope Mr. Rathbone will feel encouraged to continue his good work of giving fine music in a country where it is scarce.

Tientsin.—The successful performance of 'The Messiah,' referred to in our February issue, was repeated subsequently before an audience largely composed of Chinese of both sexes. Mr. A. Corkell again conducted.

Treharris.—On February 28 the Treharris Choral Society, ably conducted by Mr. W. J. R. Davis, gave a highly creditable performance of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul.' The 140 voices of the choir showed themselves in an excellent state of training. The principal parts were taken by Madame B. Williams, Madame Devonald Edwards, Mr. Tom Bonnell and Mr. Charles Tree.

Windsor (Ontario).—The thirteenth concert of the Windsor and Walkerville Choral Society took place under Mr. H. Whorlow Bull's direction at the Collegiate Institute on February 22. An attractive programme of spirited music, carried out in a corresponding style, included Stanford's 'The Revenge' as its principal feature, Faning's 'The miller's wooing,' Roland Rogers's 'The river floweth strong,' Rutland Boughton's choral setting of 'King Arthur had three sons,' and Elgar's 'It comes from the misty ages.'

Worcester.—Part 1 of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' was the chief number in the programme of the Musical Society's concert on March 19. Mr. W. Mann Dyson conducted a spirited interpretation in which bright tone and expressiveness played a prominent part. The miscellaneous selection included John E. West's part-song, 'In pride of May,' and Elgar's Serenade for string orchestra.

For their concert on April 23, at St. Luke's Hall, Hornsey, the Stroud Green Choral Association, conducted by Mr. H. J. Timothy, are rehearsing Hurlstone's 'Alfred the Great' and Elgar's 'Go, song of mine.'

In the course of a lecture-recital at Steinway Hall on March 5, Mr. Frederic de Lara advocated opera in English at cheap prices, with a school to teach the necessary qualifications.

Foreign Notes.

AMSTERDAM.

The Wagner Society is arranging two performances of 'Parsifal' for May 18 and 20.——Elgar's Violin concerto was played here on March 16 by Fritz Kreisler.

ANTWERP.

A new opera in four Acts, entitled 'Edénie,' by Léon Dubois, libretto by Camille Lemonnier, was produced at the Flemish Theatre on March 7, with considerable success.

AUGSBURG.

The first performance here of Humperdinck's 'Königskinder,' under the direction of Kapellmeister Bruno, was very successful.

BERLIN.

Fanny Weiland, a youthful pianist of about fourteen years, made a very successful début at the Scharwenka Hall in the first week of March.——Mahler's eighth Symphony is to be performed on May 17 and 18 in the Zirkus Schumann. The Leipsic Riedelverein Choir, strengthened by five other Leipsic choral Societies and the Hastung Boys' Choir of Berlin, will be supported by the Philharmonic Orchestra (increased for the occasion), under the conductorship of Dr. Georg Göhler (conductor of the Riedelverein) and Willem Mengelberg, of Amsterdam. ——A little-known work by Wagner, Funeral Music for the burial of Weber in Dresden, on December 14, 1844, was performed by the Blüthner Orchestra for the first time at Berlin on March 10, under the direction of Kapellmeister Bruno Weyersberg.——The Rosé Quartet opened their last concert with Arnold Schönberg's Quartet in D minor. Some of the audience received it with enthusiasm, while others hissed and whistled, and there was an extraordinary scene which almost ended in violence.

BREMEN

To commemorate the two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Frederick the Great, the Künstlerverein gave a concert at which three of his compositions for his favourite instrument (the flute) were performed.——Alfred Kaiser's opera, 'Stella Maris,' has been successfully produced here, in the presence of the composer.

BRUSSELS.

'Rhéna', a lyric-drama in four Acts and five scenes, libretto by Michel Carré, music by Jean van den Eeden, was produced at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie on February 21. The work is well, if not enthusiastically, spoken of.——A ballet in one Act, scenario by MM. Thys and Ambrosing, music by M. Joseph Jongen, was produced at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie very successfully on March 6. The descriptive title given to the ballet is 'Mimo-symphonique,' and the music is symphonic in character.——'La Farce du Cuvier,' by Gabriel Dupont and Maurice Léna, was produced at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie on March 21.

BUDA-PESTH.

The first performance of Puccini's 'Girl of the Golden West,' at which the composer was present, was very successful.

DRESDEN.

Charpentier's 'Louise' has been performed for the first time in Dresden at the Königl. Hofoper, under the direction of Herr von Schuch.——Coming novelties are Humperdinck's 'Königskinder' and Alfred Kaiser's 'Stella Maris.'

FRANKFORT-ON-MAIN.

At the sacred music Festival to be held in the Festhalle Mahler's eighth Symphony will be performed by a choir and orchestra numbering about two thousand. This will be the first occasion on which the Symphony will be performed as actually intended by the composer.

THE HAGUE.

Elgar's Violin concerto was played here on March 17 by Fritz Kreisler.

LEIPSIC.

At the seventh Philharmonic Concert, Handel's oratorio 'Jephtha' was performed for the first time. The edition used was edited by Dr. Stephani-Eisleben, who has ended the work with the first Coronation anthem. Hofkapellmeister Hagel, of Brunswick, was the conductor.——Richard Strauss's opera 'Feuersnot' has been performed for the first time, under the direction of Kapellmeister Egon Pollak, with great success. 'Salome,' 'Elektra' and 'Rosenkavalier' completed an extraordinarily successful Strauss week.——Mahler's eighth Symphony has been performed here by the Riedelverein under Dr. Georg Göhler.——Weber's letters are shortly to be published in Leipsic. The editor, M. Georges Kaiser (Dresden, Striesener Strasse 41), will be glad to hear from anybody who may possess autograph specimens of the composer's correspondence.

MONTE CARLO.

M. Massenet's new tragic opera, 'Roma,' was given for the first time on February 17. This is the sixth work by Massenet which has been produced at Monte Carlo in the space of ten years. The composer was present in the box of the Prince of Monaco, and received a tremendous ovation at the close of the performance.

MUNICH.

Professor Eberhard Schwickerath, Aix-la-Chapelle, has been chosen to succeed Mottl as Director of the Akademie der Tonkunst.——Hofkapellmeister Bruno Walther (Vienna) will conduct the Wagner Festival performances in August. This visit will probably develop into a permanent engagement as successor to Mottl at the Opera.

ROTTERDAM.

The direction of the Elberfeld Stadttheater has been invited to give the 'Rosenkavalier' at Rotterdam on March 27 and 28, with the Elberfeld scenery and company.

ROME.

The centenary of Wagner's birth will be celebrated at the Costanzi Theatre by a performance of the 'Ring' during the second week of April, 1913.

ST. PETERSBURG.

A successful performance of Granville Bantock's 'Pierrot of the Minute' was given at the seventh symphony concert of the Royal Russian Musical Society.

STUTTGART.

The first performance of Heinrich Zöllner's opera 'Zigeuner' was given here on March 15 in the Hoftheater, under the direction of Max Schillings.

WIESBADEN.

Wolf-Ferrari's opera 'Der Schmuck der Madonna' was performed here for the first time on March 7, under the direction of Professor Schlar, and was well received.

Miscellaneous.

The final competition for Free Open Scholarships at the Royal College of Music took place on February 22. The following are the names of the successful candidates. Composition: Herbert N. Howells (Lydney), and Arthur L. Benjamin (London); Pianoforte: Henry P. Myerson (Glasgow), and John M. Nicholas (Port Talbot); Singing: Ella M. Cocks (London), Constance A. Midgley (Birmingham), Jacob Williamson (Murton), and Frederick W. Taylor (Exeter); Organ: Maurice Vinden (London); Violin: Maud Gold (London), and Kenneth M. Skeaping (Bexley); Violoncello: Harold Muslin (London), and Susie D. Thuell (Falmouth); Clarinet: Rene S. Caprara (London); Horn: Aubrey C. Thonger (Windsor.)

With the object of helping to preserve the Scottish national language and national songs, a Gaelic Choir has been formed by Clann na h-Alba, under the leadership of Miss Margaret Finlay and Dr. A. F. Gibson. It meets every Wednesday at Ashburton Rooms, Red Lion Square.

At a meeting of the Incorporated Society of Musicians at Morley Hall, on March 9, Miss Fanny Davies gave a recital-lecture on 'Schumann and reading between the lines.'

The English Folk-dance Society gave an exhibition of Morrises, jigs, sword-dances, and country dances at the Suffolk Street Galleries on February 27.

Answers to Correspondents.

W. Charlton.—It is a convention which prescribes two pronunciations for the word 'wind,' one for a metrical and the other for a non-metrical context. In our opinion, it should be pronounced to rhyme with 'sinned,' whether in singing or speaking, poetry or prose. The vowel as in 'kind,' &c., is sometimes better for singing purposes, because it is 'open.'

E. P. Jones (Brisbane).—Otto Malling, the leading Danish composer for the organ, was born at Copenhagen in June, 1848. A pupil of Gade and Hartmann, he became in 1878 organist of St. Peter's Church, and in 1884 Director of the Conzert-Verein. His compositions include important works for orchestra and many for organ.

R. J. S.—There is no infallible method of preventing a pianoforte from getting out of tune, apart from special investigation into circumstances. A mere cover is as a rule ineffectual. Dampness can be counteracted by keeping a small gas jet constantly burning low down in the room.

A. S. Carter.—We cannot supply, and would welcome from our readers, information regarding original or transcribed music for pianoforte, two violins and two violoncellos. There are trios for two violins and one violoncello.

New Works for Grand Orchestra

LIFE MOODS

SYMPHONIC VARIATIONS. By ARTHUR HERVEY.

From the Morning Post, Re PHILHARMONIC CONCERT:—"Another work of native origin found a place in the scheme in Mr. Arthur Hervey's delightful set of orchestral variations entitled, 'Life Moods.' They form a singularly happy expression of this gifted writer's powers, and their melodiousness and lucidity are distinctive to a degree. Now that the work, which last night was admirably performed under the composer's direction, has at last reached the Metropolis, it should enter upon a long course of popularity."

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ and JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of Daily Technical Practice. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

THIS Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

FIFTY-SIX BOOKS, PRICE ONE SHILLING EACH.

FROM THE ABOVE:

SELECTED PIANOFORTE STUDIES

PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

IN TWO SETS (EIGHT BOOKS), PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE EACH BOOK.

THE present collection of Studies is designed to provide teachers with a short course of Pianoforte Technique adapted to the needs of the average pupil, the intention being to spare the teacher the labour of choosing a sufficiently varied selection from the large mass of material existing, and at the same time to ensure that the different departments of technique shall be undertaken in the order which experience has proved to be the most beneficial.

The Studies are grouped in two Sets, and are so arranged that the different Books in which they are contained may be taken in consecutive order, but pupils who are already further advanced than the elementary stage represented by Set I. may commence at once with Set II., which will be found to be complete in itself, and to illustrate all the essential elements of technique.

Where additional studies are desired, or studies on certain subjects which are not touched upon in this series, the larger collection, published under the title of "Progressive Studies" (from which the present examples have been selected), is of course available.

NEWS FROM WHYDAH

BALLAD

FOR CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

THE WORDS BY

JOHN MASEFIELD.

THE MUSIC BY

H. BALFOUR GARDINER.

Price Eightpence.

THE TIMES.

It is a short work which catches the ballad spirit of the words to perfection, and in which strong harmony added to bold rhythm reproduces easily the rough vigour of the verse.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Is full of a rare and glorious energy; it is a real ballad and real music.

MORNING POST.

The best work of the evening was supplied by Mr. Balfour Gardiner himself. It is full of vigour and colour unmistakably British; there is a healthy suggestion of the salt sea and a display of fine musicianship within the short limits. There is a future for the work and similar works on the same wholesome lines.

STANDARD.

Some fine choral writing and vivid orchestral "description" were the main features of Mr. Gardiner's own setting.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

Mr. Balfour Gardiner's spirited and expressive little cantata, "News from Whydah," scored a distinct success.

DAILY NEWS.

Was another success of the evening. It is a most exhilarating composition, full of character, force, and picturesqueness.

YORKSHIRE POST.

This proved a spirited and vivid piece, the music distinctly intensifying the wild and romantic lines.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

The terse, manly, picturesque, and dramatic setting of Masefield's "News from Whydah," for chorus and orchestra, by Balfour Gardiner, was perhaps the most original and valuable item in the whole programme and will be heard often, to judge from the genuine enthusiasm of its reception.

"Must be classed as one of the finest works in modern organ literature. The first movement is practically in usual Sonata form. The development section is particularly brilliant, and the quiet cadence leading into the recapitulation is of arresting beauty."

"The slow movement, in the nature of a chaconne, is beautiful and restful. A brilliant cadenza leads to an exciting introduction to a most interesting triple fugue (confined to manuals). Afterwards the composer works backwards through the sections preceding the fugue, unwinding himself, as it were, before starting on a magnificent Coda befitting a magnificent work."—Daily Mail.

A TALE OF OLD JAPAN

A CANTATA

FOR SOLI, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

THE POEM BY ALFRED NOYES.

THE MUSIC BY

S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

Price Two Shillings and Sixpence.
Paper boards, Three Shillings.
Vocal Parts, One Shilling each.
Tonic Sol-fa, One Shilling and Sixpence.
Full Score and Band Parts in the Press.

THE TIMES.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor has found a theme which suits him admirably in the poem by Mr. Alfred Noyes, for there is that mixture of high colouring and simple narrative in the words which finds a counterpart in the brilliant use of the orchestra added to simple melody which is the essence of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's music. The whole story is cleverly carried on by chorus, solo voices, and solo quartet woven together as contrasting elements of colour rather than dramatically.

The whole is full of melody, yet it never quite loses its distinction, and is carried through by its evident sincerity, its skilful technique (which is so skilful that the hearer does not notice it), and the fact that every detail bears the stamp of the composer's individual and unaffected style.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor in "A Tale of Old Japan" has written a very pretty setting of the poem by Alfred Noyes. It is another "Hiawatha." If Mr. Taylor had never written "Hiawatha," one might acclaim "A Tale of Old Japan" as an expression of a new personality in English music.

There is nothing academic in the music; it is simply written, there is practically no counterpoint, and its frankly melodious character, even in recitatives, will surely appeal greatly to provincial choirs of limited ability. It is a charming work of its kind, and will, no doubt, be immensely popular.

STANDARD.

The most striking work was Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's "A Tale of Old Japan."

The music is delicate and fragrant as the cherry blossoms of the land which inspired the poem. Its melodic outline and dainty scoring are full of charm.

The work is so picturesque and attractive that it appeals to the ear as well as to the æsthetic taste.

DAILY MAIL.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's cantata, "A Tale of Old Japan," won a frank success at its first performance at Queen's Hall last night. The composer has chosen a pretty and quaint and touching, but not too touching, ballad by Mr. Alfred Noyes, and has given it a musical setting which suggests a mosaic pattern in its bright colours and dainty themes.

DAILY NEWS.

It is pretty, simple music, full of colour and picturesqueness.

The scoring is clever and animated, and the whole composition made a good impression.

GLOBE.

It contains much very graceful and imaginative music, especially in the delightful chorus with solo quartet "Peonies, peonies crowned the May," which, in its way, is a little gem.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor has written a very dainty and attractive Cantata which ought to find great favour with choral societies.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

With the facile and effective choral writing, the neat rhythms and touches of colour suggesting something Japanese, "A Tale of Old Japan" may well be welcomed by the many choral societies in existence on the look-out for something new.

THE REFEREE.

The subject seems to have appealed with peculiar force to the composer, who has most happily realised the poetry and pathos of the libretto, and set it to music that flows on in spontaneous melody, enhanced by the art and craft of the accomplished musician. Human feeling pulsates in the music from the first to the last bar, and to listen to it is pure enjoyment.

TECHNIQUE
AND
IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING
BY
FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means o expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

BRITISH BRINSMEAD

It is because of its intrinsic qualities that the Brinsmead Piano has attained the unsurpassed reputation in which it is held in all countries. It is the piano that all the world knows, uses, and admires, not because it is British, but because it is best.

J. & P. SCHIEDMAYER PIANOS AT THE TURIN EXHIBITION, 1911.

Extract from a leading Continental paper:

"The most important Exhibition amongst German piano manufacturers is that of the world-renowned firm, J. & P. SCHIEDMAYER, OF STUTTGART. This firm has supplied 16 Imperial and Royal Courts, and is in possession of 54 medals and diplomas of honour and four Grands Prix at the International Exhibitions of Paris, 1900, St. Louis, 1904, Roubaix, 1911, and Turin, 1911, and has become as popular in Italy as in other countries. The Concert Room at Turin contains eleven instruments of magnificent construction. All the instruments are distinguished by a full and delightful tone."

Mr. SCHIEDMAYER, head of the firm of J. & P. Schiedmayer, has been officially appointed Judge at 13 Exhibitions (including Brussels, 1910), at all of which his pianos were, of course, "hors concours." This honour acknowledges him to be one of the greatest authorities on piano construction in the world.

The Trade and Profession are invited to call at Archibald Ramsden's, and test for themselves as to the magnificent tone quality and construction of these instruments.

SOLO-VIOLINIST.

A Musician of large experience in Orchestral, Chamber Music, and Solo-playing, of good appearance, wishes to Deputise or accept Engagements during the months of July and August, either as Solo-violinist (on Tour) or Leader or First Violin in good Orchestra. Advertiser is also a capable Piano Accompanist. Highest references.

Communications to be addressed to L. P., c/o Novello & Co., Ltd., 160, Wardour Street, W.

THE PIANIST'S GREATEST DIFFICULTY IS PLAYING AT SIGHT.

All pianists who experience this difficulty should examine for themselves the wonderful results obtained by students of the Ehremayer System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing. Three months' study, with little more than 15 minutes' daily practice, will enable any pianist to play all his or her new music at first sight. The results are permanent, and, when once the System has been studied, all difficulties in playing at sight are overcome for good. Lessons are given by correspondence, and apply to pianists of all degrees of proficiency.

The System is not only approved by professional musicians, but has the enthusiastic approval of the hundreds of pupils who have taken the course.

Descriptive Booklet is sent post-free.

"This is a pleasing series of four gracefully-written duets for treble voices, entitled respectively, 'Dawn,' 'Noon,' 'Twilight,' 'Night,' There is a complete contrast in the pieces, though brightness of treatment and lively melody characterise them all. The accompaniments most happily enforce the spirit of the several themes. The 'Dawn' opens tranquilly, but soon assumes a more joyous aspect; 'Noon' by the brook is charmingly dealt with; 'Twilight' is involved in mysterious sounds conveyed by the occasional use of diminished fifths with an admirable though daring effect; and 'Night' brings us into the midst of a fairy revel. The voice parts are cleverly, though spontaneously designed; and it is certain that those who take the trouble to study them will be glad for the knowledge and pleasure they will bring."—Musical Times.

THE ELFIN HILL

AN OPERETTA FOR UNISON SINGING.

"Mr. Gaul has been particularly happy in infusing the Norse spirit into that portion of his music which deals with goblin life in Norway. When the goblins become visitors in fairyland, the character of the music changes; lightness is its predominant feature, perhaps the choicest fragment being a fairy dance. This latter, together with a very characteristic dance of elves and a shadow dance, were beautifully executed."—Birmingham Gazette.

LIVERPOOL'S CATHEDRAL ORGAN WORKS

IN LAST MONTH'S ANNOUNCEMENT stress was laid upon the magnitude of RUSHWORTH AND DREAPER'S new Works and the old-established repute of the RUSHWORTH ORGANS. . . . NOW it is desired to emphasise the aims and ideals which actuate the conduct of these Works.

Every RUSHWORTH Organ, irrespective of size or cost, is built to a Single Standard of excellence in the essentials of workmanship, quality of materials and general construction. In a word, there are no Second or Third Grade RUSHWORTH Organs. Further, every RUSHWORTH Organ is built, erected and tested complete, under the same roof and subject to the continuous oversight of those responsible for the original planning and its ultimate success.

These ideal conditions permit of a uniformly high standard of craftsmanship and continuous improvement in details which count for much in the artistic completeness and mechanical efficiency of RUSHWORTH Organs.

The cost to maintain such rigidly high standards of production would clearly be out of the question if the hand-to-mouth methods of old-style builders were adopted. BUT in Liverpool's Cathedral Organ Works, the necessity for active co-operation between the old-time sincerity of purpose and modern Commercial Efficiency is fully recognized.

HERE costly and ingenious high-speed Machinery and other appliances of special design secure the extreme precision of workmanship demanded, with a Minimum of labour. Here efficient Organization and ample Resources effect marked Economies in working, and in the purchase of Raw Materials. In the vital matter of Timber these Works enjoy the great advantage of choosing from the World's supplies at Importers' prices.

RUSHWORTH & DREAPER invite an opportunity to show those interested over Liverpool's Cathedral Organ Works and to arrange for trials of representative Rushworth Organs. Or, Designs, Estimates, and Specifications will be submitted for the Building or Re-Building of Organs of any size in any part of the World. Illustrated brochure on request.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

From the opening Allegretto scherzando—a particularly fresh and blithesome section—to the concluding Gavotte and Musette, the music runs a simple, melodious course. . . . The work is conceived throughout in a joyous mood, but the composer, by his deft use of rhythms, never allows the hearer to experience any sense of sameness.

STANDARD.

On many occasions Mr. Percy Pitt has proved his versatile musical gifts, but rarely have they been indicated in a more attractive way and with such a pleasant vein of fancy as in his "Serenade." . . . These five sketches are like little water-colours in their lightness of design and delicacy of hue, and appeal to the imagination because of their unpretentious, simple, yet interesting character.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

The "Serenade" scored one of the most brilliant successes of the season. It has everything in its favour—melody, piquant orchestration, and clever musicianship.

DAILY MAIL.

It is a work which should be immensely popular.

DAILY NEWS.

The Suite as a whole made very pleasant hearing, and should prove popular with conductors of small orchestras.

SUNDAY TIMES.

Its melodiousness, clearness, and deft orchestration make it delightful hearing.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

THE ORGAN

BY JOHN STAINER.

EDITED BY JOHN E. WEST.

An important feature of the present Edition of this invaluable and popular Organ Primer is the adoption of the now universally recognized system of fingering—1.2.3.4.5., which is here substituted for the older system—×.1.2.3.4.—in all cases where fingering is marked.

In the explanatory portion of the book, opportunity has been taken of briefly mentioning one or two of the principal additions and improvements to the instrument which have been made since the book was first issued.

Bearing in mind that the Author's aim was to assist, in as concise a manner as possible, the early steps of an organ student, the Editor has refrained from adding any further exercises or pieces to those which were already given. But the addition of a few extra fingering and phrasing marks seemed necessary here and there, and, in the five concluding pieces, the laying-out of one or two of the manual passages has been rendered clearer to the player's eye by means of a slight re-staving.

The admirable explanations and diagrams of the Tubular-Pneumatic and Electric actions have been supplied by Mr. L. Simon, of Messrs. Norman & Beard, Ltd.

SACRED DUETS

BY

J. SEBASTIAN BACH.

Edited, with marks of expression and phrasing, and an English adaptation, by

E. STANLEY ROPER, B.A., MUS. B.

This edition of Bach Duets has been prepared, by request, for use in schools where the study of classical vocal music is encouraged. The presentation of the items in other than the original keys has been rendered necessary, that the natural compass of the voices usually found in such institutions might not be exceeded.

It has been considered advisable to avoid a strictly literal translation but the general spirit of the German text has been preserved.
